Our God and God of our Fathers:

RABBI DR. STANLEY M. WAGNER

(Mrs. SCHROEDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Stanley M. Wagner is rabbi of the Beth ha Medrosh Hagodol (B.M.H.) congregation in Denver, Colo., and professor of Judaic studies and director of the Center for Judaic Studies at the University of Denver. He also serves as chaplain of the Colorado State Senate, the first and only rabbi ever appointed to that position, and as director of Colorado's Mizel Museum of Judaica.

Rabbi Wagner is a religious leader of national renown who came to Denver in September 1972, after serving for 2 years as national executive vice president of the Religious Zionists of America, a role which catapulted him to key positions on the national and international Jewish scene, in such organizations as the American Zionist Organization, Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, and the American Conference for Soviet Jewry. In 1979, Rabbi Wagner was awarded "Life Tenure" by his congregation "in recognition of his significant contributions to Jewish life and to the community."

Ordained at the Yeshiva University's Rabbinical Seminary, Rabbi Wagner holds five other degrees of higher learning from this institution, including a doctorate in Jewish history. He served as an instructor for 4 years in the Department of Ancient Languages and Literatures at the University of Kentucky while holding a pulpit in Lexington, and was appointed instructor in histo.. at Hofstra University in New York serving as rabbi of the Baldwin Jewish Center in Long Island. He has delivered a number of scholarly papers at conferences of the American Association of Professors of Hebrew, the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis, the National Foreign Language Conference, and the Congress on Science and Ethics, and he has spoken as guest lecturer and "Scholar In Residence" in communities from coast to coast.

Dr. Wagner has been cited by the Bonds of Israel, United Jewish Appeal, Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, Jewish National Fund, ORT, and Yeshiva University, and he was the recipient of the Shofar Award from the Boy Scouts of America. He is listed in "Who's Who in World Jewry" (1972), "Who's Who in Religion" (1977), and "Who's Who in American Jewry" (1980). He served as president of the Long Island Commission of Orthodox Rabbis and the Nassau-Suffolk Association of Rabbis, vice president of the Rabbinic Alumni of Yeshiva University, chairman of the Rabbinic Advisory Council of the Jewish National Fund, panelist in the American Arbitration Association, director of the Judaic Program at Camp B'nai B'rith, resident scholar for seven summers at B'nai B'rith Youth's International Leadership Trainee program, and he currently serves as a member of the National Adult Jewish Education Commission of B'nai B'rith.

Rabbi Wagner is one of the few clergymen in America to have delivered invocations both at the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives. Dr. Wagner has written scholarly and popular articles in publications such as Congress Bi-Weekly, In Jewish Bookland, National Jewish Monthly, the Synagogue Light, and has had many of his sermons selected as the "year's best" and published by the Rabbinical Council of America. He has edited or written four significant volumes entitled "Great Confrontations in Jewish History," "Traditions of the American Jew," and "Great Schisms in Jewish History," published by the University of Denver, and "A Piece of My Mind," published by KTAV. President Jimmy Carter invited the rabbi to the White House in March 1978, to present "Traditions of the American Jew" to him, personally. Dr. Wagner is also general editor of a three-volume series on "Christian and Jewish Traditions in the 20th Century" to be published by Abingdon Press. The first volume, entitled "Scripture—Its Authority, Interpretation, and Relevance" appeared in September 1982. Rabbi Wagner has traveled extensively and has been to Israel 12 times on Government study grants and as leader of pilgrimages. In 1976, Dr. Wagner was sent on a mission to Russia where he met with the leaders of the Jewish communities in Moscow, Kiev, and Leningrad.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is the day for the call of the Consent Calendar. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

HARRY PORTER TOWER AT LOVELL FIELD

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 2484) to designate the air traffic control tower at Lovell Field as the "Harry Porter Tower."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 2484

A bill to designate the air traffic control tower at Lovell Field as the "Harry Porter Tower"

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the air traffic control tower at Lovell Field in Chattanooga, Tennessee, is designated and shall hereafter be known as the "Harry Porter Tower". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, or other paper of the United States to such control tower shall be held and considered to refer to "Harry Porter Tower".

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. MINETA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, the bill designates the air traffic control tower at Lovell Field as the "Harry Porter Tower" to honor one of the Nation's aviation pioneers. Harry Porter, known as the dean of Tennessee aviation, has been active in aviation as a pilot and a businessman. This is a fitting tribute for this gentleman. He began flying in 1923, over 60 years ago, making him one of the oldest active pilots in America. Harry Porter has become known as the dean of aviation in Chattanooga and throughout Tennessee and has been awarded many aviation honors, including the Amelia Earhart Medal. During his aviation career, he has been an instructor, an FAA inspector, and a businessman. He was involved in business at Lovell Field between 1932 and 1967, and he has continued into his 90th year to be active as an adviser and consultant to the airport.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that the bill be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, at this point I am very pleased to yield to our very fine colleague, the gentlewoman from Tennessee (Mrs. LLOYD).

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 2484, which designates the air traffic control tower at Lovell Field in Chattanooga, Tenn., as the "Harry Porter Tower."

Harry Porter is one of the oldest licensed pilots in the Nation and has been flying since 1923. Since that first flight, he has had a unique and varied career and has become a symbol of aviation history to the people of Chattanooga. Mr. Porter served as a flight instructor in World War II, training thousands of pilots to fly military aircraft during that period. Later he served as an inspector for the FAA and at one point even worked for the Internal Revenue Service, locating stills hidden in the woods.

It is appropriate that the air traffic control tower at Lovell Field be named after Harry Porter since so much of his life has been spent at this aviation facility. He operated his own business at Lovell Field from 1932, when the field opened, until 1967, when he sold his firm. He still maintains an office there as well as a position as adviser and consultant to the present owners.

Harry Porter has had a distinguished career and has been awarded many honors including the coveted Amelia Earhart Medal. He will soon be celebrating his 90th birthday in Chattanooga where he still resides with his wife, Eunice. His 89th birthday has not stopped him though. He regularly flies about 5 hours a week. I look forward to my visits to his facilities where a warm welcome and a word of encouragement greets me.

In view of his accomplishments in the field of aviation, and his contribution to aviation I think it only right that we name the air traffic control tower at Lovell Field after Harry Porter and I urge my colleagues to support this measure.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I urge the bill be adopted.

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill. This will honor one of Tennessee's and Chattanooga's aviation leaders, Harry Porter. It is a bill that has passed the Senate without objection, and we know of no objection in the House. The administration has also informed the committee that they have no objection.

I congratulate the distinguished gentlelady from Tennessee, Mrs. LLOYD, for introducing the bill and bringing Mr. Porter's achievements to our attention.

Again, I urge passage of this bill. It is a well-deserved recognition for one of the Nation's great aviators.●

● Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I join my colleagues in supporting H.R. 2484 which would redesignate the air traffic control tower at Lovell Field in Chattanooga, Tenn., as the "Harry Porter Tower."

Harry Porter, who began flying in 1923, is one of the oldest active pilots in the United States, who not only served his country in World War I, but again in World War II when he trained many of our military pilots. During his notable career, he also served as an FAA inspector and has been awarded many honors, including the Amelia Earhart Medal for his major contributions to aviation.

Lovell Field in Chattanooga is the fourth largest commercial facility in the State of Tennessee and, in light of Mr. Porter's continuous presence there for over 50 years, it would be most fitting if the airport tower was renamed in his honor. In addition, the city commission of Chattanooga has unanimously requested that this honor be bestowed on Mr. Porter.

As is the usual practice with legislation of this nature, H.R. 2484 includes language which will assure that the FAA will not be required to change any air traffic control procedures or republish any aeronautical information which refers to the tower as the Chattanooga Tower.

For these reasons, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 2484.●

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 2484, which would designate the air traffic control tower at Lovell Field in Chattanooga, Tenn., as the "Harry Porter Control Tower."

Harry Porter started out his flying career in a World War I Jenny and spent his early days barnstorming through the Southeast as a stunt pilot. He served his country honorably in World War I and again during World War II as a flight instructor. In addition to his contributions to our military effort, he has had a most distinguished career in civil aviation, having founded the Harry Porter Flight Service in Chattanooga, where he was also an FAA inspector, flight instructor, and businessman.

Harry Porter has been an active pilot for over 60 years and is known as the Dean of Pilots in Chattanooga. In fact, the Federal Aviation Administration has confirmed that he is among the oldest pilots in America.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2484 is a tribute to a pioneer in this Nation's aviation history. I believe this bill deserves our support and join my colleagues on the Public Works and Transportation Committee in urging its passage.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Works and Transportation be discharged from further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 1365) entitled the "Harry Porter Control Tower," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 1365

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the air traffic control tower at the Chattanooga Municipal Airport (Lovell Field) is designated and shall hereafter be known as the Harry Porter Control Tower. Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, or other paper of the United States to such control tower shall be held and considered to refer to the "Harry Porter Control Tower".

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 2484) was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

THE JOHN G. FARY TOWER AT MIDWAY AIRPORT, CHICAGO

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 4202) to designate the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport, Chicago, as the "John G. Fary Tower."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 4202

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport, Chicago, Illinois, is designated and shall hereafter be known as the "John G. Fary Tower". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, or other paper of the United States to such control tower shall be held and considered to refer to the "John G. Fary Tower".

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. MINETA) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, the bill designates the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport as the "John G. Fary Tower" to honor a former Member of the House of Representatives, the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, and the Subcommittee on Aviation.

John G. Fary was instrumental in the reopening of the Midway Airport to commercial airline service. His efforts resulted in the institution of convenient, efficient air service to the citizens of Chicago, as well as citizens all around the country traveling to Chicago.

John G. Fary deserves this honor for his efforts with regard to Midway Airport, as well as for his active and dedicated role in numerous important pieces of aviation legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that the bill be adopted.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong support for H.R. 4202, a bill to designate the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport in Chicago, as the "John G. Fary Tower."

The Honorable John G. Fary represented the Fifth Congressional District of Illinois with distinction from 1975 until 1982. During his service in the Congress of the United States, he was assigned to the Public Works Committee, where he achieved the chairmanship of the Subcommittee on Public Buildings and Grounds and gave able and inspired leadership in this capacity. He also served as a member of the Subcommittee on Surface Transportation.

It is fitting that the control tower at Midway be named the John G. Fary Tower for it was largely through his efforts as a member of the House Public Works and Transportation Committee that the revitalization of Midway Airport took place and flights were restored at Midway between Washington and Chicago.

Therefore, I urge the support of my colleagues for H.R. 4202 as a much-deserved tribute to John G. Fary, a truly dedicated public servant and outstanding citizen of our country.●

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, it is truly a great honor for me to rise in support of this bill to designate the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport the "John Fary Tower." Naming the tower at Midway after him is a most fitting tribute to this former Member. In our committee John Fary was known as the father of Midway Airport. His tenacious efforts to revitalize and bring commercial air service to Midway Airport were successful and a great service to his constituents and aviation.

I urge the Members to pass this bill honoring our former colleague.●

● Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I also want to express my support for H.R. 4202, which would redesignate the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport in Chicago as the "John G. Fary Tower."

As my colleagues are well aware, John Fary ably represented the Fifth District of Illinois from 1975 until 1982 and was a respected and hard-working member of this committee. As the former ranking minority member on the Aviation Subcommittee, I remember John Fary's great interest and support for the revitalization of Midway Airport as a viable alternative to Chicago's O'Hare Field. Today, Midway Airport is the second largest commercial facility in the State of Illinois and in calendar year 1982, enplaned over 650,000 people. In addition, Midway Airlines, a very successful new entrant carrier, uses the airport as its primary hub for flights along its route system.

Mr. Speaker, without the hard work and perseverance of John G. Fary, I do not believe that Midway Airport would be the successful facility it is today. I think the people of Chicago have benefited greatly as a result of his efforts and I think it is quite fitting that the airport traffic control tower be redesignated in his honor.

In accordance with our usual procedure, the adoption of H.R. 4202 will not require the FAA to change its air traffic control procedures for any references to Midway tower now contained in published aeronautical material.

For these reasons, I would urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the legislation introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. STANGELAND). This legislation will name the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport, in Chicago, Ill., the "John G. Fary Tower." This legislation will enable the Congress to honor the former Representative from the Fifth Congressional District in Illinois, John Fary. John served in Congress from 1975 to 1982. He was a member of the Public Works and Transportation Committee, and was chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Subcommittee.

I succeeded John in Congress and also serve on the Public Works Committee. I have seen and heard the warmth and affection that John's former colleagues had for him. They have told me of his friendly behavior, generous ways, and of his strong loyalty to his fellow committee members and the Democratic Party.

To designate the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport will be of special significance to John. While a Congressman, John made one of his main goals the revitalization of Midway Airport. He aided this cause with his membership on the Aviation Subcommittee. It is fitting that the Congress honor John in this manner. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

● Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4202, a bill which would designate the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport as the "John G. Fary Tower."

As my colleagues are well aware, John G. Fary served with distinction in this body from July 1975 until January 1983. He served on the Public Works and Transportation Committee since 1975 and became chairman of the Public Buildings and Grounds Subcommittee in 1981. He served as an articulate leader of that subcommittee for the duration of the 97th Congress.

Mr. Speaker, John Fary, a native of Chicago, Ill., served Chicago constituents with 7½ years of dedicated service. He was a vocal supporter of Midway Airport and was involved in the revitalization effort which resulted in Midway becoming once again an important air carrier hub. Accordingly, I believe that the renaming of the air traffic control tower at Chicago's Midway Airport is a fitting tribute to our former committee colleague and Member of this body.

For these reasons, I would like to join my colleagues on the Public Works and Transportation Committee in support of this legislation and urge its passage.●

● Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, as author of this legislation, I strongly urge enactment of H.R. 4202, a bill to designate the air traffic control tower at Midway Airport in Chicago, Ill., as the "John G. Fary Tower."

Congressman John Fary was elected to the 94th Congress, by special election, on July 8, 1975. He served with distinction in this body until 1982. During his 7 years in the Congress, John became one of the most loyal and beloved Members of Congress.

Congressman John Fary served with admiration on the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation. He was a member of the Subcommittee on Aviation, and in that capacity, he doggedly and persistently kept the issue with government witnesses as to the need of reestablishing service, convenient service, into Midway Airport. Due to his efforts, Midway Airport is now open and air service to Chicago is now convenient to all persons traveling to Chicago.

Mr. Speaker, passage of this legislation, in my judgment, is one that perfectly meshes the honor with the individual being honored and the facility involved. This is a small tribute to pay to a devoted American, who always worked tirelessly in behalf of all people. John Fary truly earned that respect, admiration, and esteem of all Members of Congress.

I will miss his experience, wisdom, and friendship. The Congress of the United States has lost an able legislator, a great American, and above all, a warm, compassionate human being. The people of Chicago, as well as the Nation, can be justifiably proud of the accomplishments of Congressman John Fary. We all wish John and Mrs. Fary many years of happiness in their well-earned retirement.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

THE WILLIAM A. BARRETT SOCIAL SECURITY BUILDING IN PHILADELPHIA AND THE EDWIN B. FORSYTHE POST OFFICE BUILDING IN MOORESTOWN, N.J.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 4665) to name the social security building in Philadelphia, Pa., known as the Mid-Atlantic Program Service Center, as the "William A. Barrett Social Security Building," and to name the U.S. Post Office Building in Moorestown, N.J., as the "Edwin B. Forsythe Post Office Building."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the social security building located at 300 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and known as the Mid-Atlantic Program Service Center shall hereafter be named and designated as the "William A. Barrett Social Security Building". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such building shall be held to be a reference to the "William A. Barrett Social Security Building".

With the following committee amendment:

SEC. 2. The United States Post Office Building located at 200 Chester Avenue, Moorestown, New Jersey, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Edwin B. Forsythe Post Office Building". Any reference in a law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such building shall be held to be a reference to the "Edwin B. Forsythe Post Office Building".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

● Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, the House lost the services of one of its most able and distinguished Members with the passing on Thursday of the Honorable Edwin B. Forsythe of New Jersey.

It was a measure of the great respect and admiration for this outstanding public servant and humanitarian that following his announcement that due to serious illness he would not seek reelection, the Committee on Public Works and Transportation voted unanimously to name the U.S. Post Office building in Congressman Ed Forsythe's hometown in his honor.

I believe that this would be an entirely appropriate tribute to my good friend and colleague for his outstanding career of public service to the State of New Jersey and the Nation, and I urge passage of H.R. 4665, which would designate the U.S. Post Office in Moorestown, N.J., as the "Edwin B. Forsythe Post Office Building."

Ed Forsythe was already an experienced public servant when he came to Congress. He literally had done it all, starting as a member of the Moorestown Board of Adjustment, and moving on to become mayor of Moorestown; a member of the New Jersey Senate, where he served terms as minority leader, president, and president pro tempore; and Acting Governor of New Jersey in 1968.

I had the pleasure of serving with Ed Forsythe from the time he came to Congress in 1970 and to work closely with him on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which he joined in 1972. I shall greatly miss his wise counsel and friendship.

Congressman Forsythe became the ranking minority member of the Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment Subcommittee in 1975 and succeeded me as ranking minority member of the full committee at the start of the 98th Congress.

Prior to this Congress, he had also served on the Committee on Science and Technology and was a member of the Select Committee on the Outer Continental Shelf, serving as ranking minority member of that select committee at its end.

Throughout his remarkable career in this body, Ed was a mover and doer in a quietly efficient manner. However, if his style and technique for getting things done did not instantly attract a great deal of public attention, his quiet determination and commitment to those issues he championed, especially environmental protection, was legendary, and his effectiveness a matter of record.

His leadership was crucial in the enactment of the National Environmental Protection Act, Non-Game Fish and Wildlife Act, Alaskan Land Act, Marine Mammal Protection Act, Endangered Species Act, and the 200-mile limit offshore fishing law.

He received many awards and recognitions, including the Legislator of the Year Award presented to him in 1980 by the National Wildlife Federation for his outstanding contribution to the wise use and management of the Nation's natural resources.

Congressman Ed Forsythe was held in the highest esteem both in and out of the Halls of Congress, and approval of the bill before us today would be a most fitting tribute to his memory and his many good works. Accordingly, I urge my House colleagues to give H.R. 4665 swift approval.●

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, it is with an enormous sense of loss and regret that I propose the naming of the post office in Moorestown, N.J., as the Edwin B. Forsythe Post Office Building. I wish to convey my condolences to his family. I regret that we were unable to honor my friend and colleague before his passing last week.

For the 14 years that Ed Forsythe served in Congress, we represented adjacent districts. We both represented seashore districts and we had concerns about many of the same issues. With his position on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and mine on the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, we were able to work closely together.

Ed Forsythe was no flamboyant showman but he was truly a gentleman. In his distinctively quiet way, he effectively represented the interests of his constituents in New Jersey. He was able to leave a significant imprint on much of the environmental legislation, especially bills dealing with wildlife, during his time in Congress.

He played a significant role in establishing the 200-mile fishing limit, and he worked long and hard on such legislation as the Endangered Species Act, the National Environmental Protection Act, and the Marine Mammal Protection Act. At the time he died, Ed Forsythe was involved in several important initiatives, including the fish and wildlife conservation fund and the effort to phase out ocean dumping of sewage sludge.

Ed was an extremely principled Member of Congress. He was a member of the other party and we had conflicting views on many subjects. However, there is no question that he always voted his conscience. Ed was no rubberstamp for any party or any point of view and his voting record demonstrates that fact.

Even before he arrived in Congress in 1970, Ed had a long and distinguished career in local government dating back to 1948, when he served as secretary to the Moorestown Board of Adjustment. Following that, he was elected to the Moorestown Township Committee. He served as mayor for 5 years and later served as chairman of the township planning board.

Ed served 7 years in the State senate, serving as minority leader and as senate president before being elected to Congress.

Under these circumstances, it is certainly appropriate that we name the post office in Ed Forsythe's hometown after him. It is a small tribute to a gentleman of distinction that we take this action today. Ed Forsythe deserves to be remembered for his contributions in Congress, for his service to his constituents, and for being a truly fine human being. As a colleague of his from New Jersey, I can say that he will truly be missed.●

● Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of section 1 of H.R. 4665 is to memoralize Congressman William A. Barrett. He died while serving in the U.S. House of Representatives on April 12, 1976, at age 79. William Barrett was born in Philadelphia, Pa., and graduated from Brown Preparatory School and St. Joseph's College in Philadelphia.

He was first elected to the 79th Congress (January 3, 1945 to January 3, 1947), was again elected to the U.S. House of Representatives for the 81st Congress and was reelected to the 12 succeeding Congresses. He served on the Committee on Banking, Currency and Housing with distinction for 24 years, and was chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Development from 1956 until his death. During his tenure, he also served on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the Joint Committee on Defense Production.

This legislation honors an outstanding American who served with distinction and dedication in this body into his 15th term. William Barrett was a man who always served the people, and his long record in this body indicates clearly the contribution he made for all people in the fields of social welfare, housing, and urban development. He worked hard and successfully to use the vast resources of the Federal Government to serve the most in need and to correct injustice. Every evening, after the business of the House was completed, William Barrett traveled back to Philadelphia to meet personally with his constituents and to help resolve their problems.

In view of his distinguished service to the First Congressional District of Pennsylvania and to the Nation, it is fitting that the Social Security Administration's Mid-Atlantic Program Service Center Building at 300 Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia, Pa., be known as the "William A. Barrett Social Security Building."

Section 2 of H.R. 4665 honors a distinguished American, the Honorable Edwin B. Forsythe, who died of cancer at his home in Moorestown, N.J., on March 29, 1984. He was serving his 14th year in Congress.

Congressman Edwin B. Forsythe was born in Westtown, Pa., on January 17, 1916. He attended public schools in Medford and Mount Holly, N.J., later graduating from Westtown School in Westtown, Pa.

His wife, Mary, resides in Moorestown. A married daughter, Susan, lives in Swathmore, Pa., with her husband and two children.

Congressman Forsythe is a former small businessman who began his government career in 1948 as secretary of the Moorestown Board of Adjustment. He was elected to the Township Committee in 1953 and served as mayor from 1957 to 1962, when he became chairman of the Township Planning Board, a post he held through 1963. He was elected to the New Jersey State Senate in 1963, a position he held until his election to Congress in 1971. In the New Jersey Senate, Congressman Forsythe served as assistant majority leader, minority leader, senate president, and Acting Governor in 1968. One of his chief accomplishments in the senate was sponsorship and passage of legislation creating the statewide grand jury which, for the first time, gave State law enforcement officials the tools to adequately pursue and prosecute organized crime and official corruption.

He was first elected to Congress on November 2, 1970, to fill the expired term of William T. Cahill in the 91st Congress, and also to the 92d Congress, and has been reelected to each succeeding Congress and was the senior Member of the New Jersey Republican congressional delegation.

Congressman Edwin B. Forsythe was ranking minority member of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. In that influential leadership position, Mr. Forsythe commanded respect and was held in high esteem by his colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives for development and oversight of legislation affecting U.S. maritime policy, the Coast Guard, the Panama Canal, the Outer Continental Shelf, fisheries, and wildlife. He also served as ranking minority member of the subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation, and the Environment where, since 1975, he demonstrated his effectiveness in fashioning workable legislation in the areas of fisheries development and protection, wildlife management and conservation, and environmental protection.

Congressman Forsythe was a prime sponsor of the 200-mile-limit offshore fishing law enacted in 1976, and has played a critical role in such important national legislation as the National Environmental Protection Act, the Non-Game Fish and Wildlife Act, the Alaskan Land Act, the Endangered Species Act, and the Marine Mammal Protection Act.

He was instrumental in efforts to preserve the Pinelands, to implement effective and fair international management of the bluefin tuna, and to resolve the dumping of sludge in the Atlantic Ocean.

His marks of leadership shall remain indelibly on those committees' records, and his positive influence on the legislation produced by those bodies shall have a profound influence on the day-to-day lives of millions of Americans.

New Jersey and the Nation have every reason to be proud of what he has achieved during his 14 years of devoted service here in the House of Representatives, which should be an inspiration to all those who follow after. The State of New Jersey and this Nation have lost a distinguished leader, legislator, and a warm, friendly human being. He will be sorely missed by the State of New Jersey and colleagues in the Congress.

In view of his long and distinguished career, and in view of his many years of outstanding service to the people of the 13th Congressional District of New Jersey, and to the Nation, it is fitting and proper that the U.S. Post Office building located at 200 Chester Avenue, Moorestown, N.J., be named in his honor as the "Edwin B. Forsythe Post Office Building."●

● Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the bill H.R. 4665, as amended by the Public Works and Transportation Committee, which designates the Mid-Atlantic Program Service Center in Philadelphia, Pa., as the "William A. Barrett Social Security Building" and the U.S. Post Office building in Moorestown, N.J., as the "Edwin B. Forsythe Post Office Building."

William Barrett served with distinction and dedication in this House for 24 years. During his tenure his most outstanding achievements were made during his service as chairman of the Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Development of the powerful Committee on Banking, Currency, and Housing.

His long record, particularly in the fields of social welfare, housing, and urban development, clearly reflects the contributions he made for people in all walks of life. At this time, it is only fitting that we designate the Mid-Atlantic Program Service Center in his hometown of Philadelphia in his honor.

Mr. Speaker, section 2 of the bill honors our respected colleague, the Honorable Edwin B. Forsythe, who passed away late last week. I was deeply saddened by his death and by the loss in this body of an outstanding Member.

Knowing as we did of Congressman Forsythe's terminal illness, I had hoped that the House could act on H.R. 4665 before his death, but time proved to be too short. The bill received unanimous and expeditious action by the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, which was an expression of the high esteem in which our Members held the gentleman from New Jersey.

I had the good fortune to work with Ed Forsythe on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which he so ably served as ranking minority member. He was a dedicated, hard-working Member, respected by and respectful of his committee colleagues. He was always extremely helpful to me, and I greatly respected his wisdom and his counsel.

Ed Forsythe had extensive experience in local and State Government before he started his congressional career in 1970. From the mayoralty of Moorestown, N.J., he moved to the New Jersey Senate, where he served as minority leader and president of that body, and eventually served as Acting Governor of the State in 1968.

As a Member of Congress, Ed Forsythe moved quickly to become one of this body's most respected voices in support of environmental protection, wildlife management and conservation, fisheries development and protection, and the conservation of the coastal resources of the United States.

He was a moving force behind the enactment of major legislation in these areas, including the National Environmental Protection Act, the Non-Game Fish and Wildlife Act, Marine Mammal Protection Act, and the Endangered Species Act.

Such was his commitment to sound preservation policies affecting fish and wildlife, that even as he assumed the duties of ranking minority member of the full Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries at the start of this Congress, he retained his ranking minority membership of the Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment Subcommittee, which he had held since 1975.

We share, with his family, friends, and the Nation the sorrowful loss of Congressman Forsythe, and I am pleased that we might pay tribute to him in this small way by designating the U.S. Post Office building in Moorestown, N.J., as the "Edwin B. Forsythe Post Office Building."●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to name the social security building in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, known as the Mid-Atlantic Program Service Center, as the 'William A. Barrett Social Security Building', and to name the United States Post Office Building in Moorestown, New Jersey, as the 'Edwin B. Forsythe Post Office Building'.".

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE "BYRON G. ROGERS FEDERAL BUILDING AND U.S. COURTHOUSE" IN DENVER, COLO.

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 4700) to designate the Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse at 1961 Stout Street, Denver, Colo., as the "Byron G. Rogers Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse".

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

H.R. 4700

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembeld, That the Federal Building and United States Courthouse at 1961 Stout Street, in Denver, Colorado, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Byron G. Rogers Federal Building and United States Courthouse". Any reference in any law, map, regulation, document, record, or any other paper of the United States to such building shall be deemed to be a reference to the "Byron G. Rogers Federal Building and United States Courthouse".

● Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 4700 designates the Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse at 1961 Stout Street in Denver, Colo., as the "Byron G. Rogers Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse".

This legislation honors an outstanding American who served with distinction and dedication in this body for 20 years, commencing on November 7, 1950. Byron Rogers was a man who always had the national viewpoint, and his long record of service both in the Colorado Legislature and here in this body indicated quite clearly the contribution he made to all Americans. During his tenure in the Congress, he pursued his concern for justice as a member of the House Judiciary Committee. He was a staunch supporter of civil rights and was successful in bringing about meaningful legislation in this field as a member of the House Committee on Civil Rights.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that H.R. 4700 be adopted.●

● Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this legislation is to memorialize Congressman

Byron G. Rogers, a Denver Democrat who represented Colorado's First Congressional District for 20 years.

Congressman Byron G. Rogers was born in Hunt County, Tex., on August 1, 1900. He served in the U.S. Army during World War I, was a victim of the influenza epidemic, developed tuberculosis, and moved to Denver, Colo.. to recover. He received his LL.B. degree from the University of Denver in 1925. Subsequently, he practiced law in Las Animas, Colo.

Congressman Byron G. Rogers was elected county attorney of Bent County, Colo., in 1929 which was the beginning of a 41-year career in public office. He served in the Colorado House of Representatives from 1931 to 1935, and was speaker of the House in 1933. He was Assistant U.S. Attorney General for Colorado from 1934 to 1936, and, subsequently, he was appointed and elected Attorney General of Colorado; a position be held until 1938. He served as State chairman of the Democratic Central Committee of Colorado from 1941 to 1942, and served as county chairman of the Denver Democratic Central Committee from 1945 to 1950.

Byron G. Rogers was elected as a Democrat to the 82d Congress on November 7, 1950, and was reelected to the 83d, 84th, 85th, 86th, 87th, 88th, 89th, 90th, and 91st Congresses.

During his tenure in this House, Congressman Rogers served on the House Judiciary Committee. Upon his retirement from Congress, the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee praised him as a legislator who "in his unique, unassuming way, helped shepherd through Congress the kind of legislation which brought hope and light to millions of our citizens."

In addition, Congressman Rogers served on the House Committee on Civil Rights. He was a staunch supporter of civil rights, and the fights he fought were the precursors of today's battles. He logged many hours on civil rights issues and was commonly known as "Old Civil Rights Rogers".

During his two decades of service in Congress, Byron Rogers represented Denver with vigor and distinction in the U.S. House of Representatives. As Denver grew to become a major metropolitan city on the eastern slopes of the Colorado Rockies, Byron Rogers was cognizant of the associated Federal presence which would be required. He continually fought for Federal dollars and was responsible for the construction of the Federal Office Building and Courthouse, the Post Office Terminal Annex, the Air Force Accounting and Finance Center, and Chatfield Dam.

Byron Rogers was a man of unwavering principle and dedication, and he provided Coloradoans with the highest quality of representation in the Congress.

In view of his distinguished service to the city of Denver, and this Nation, it is fitting that the Federal Building and U.S. Courthouse at 1961 Stout Street, in Denver, Colo., be known as the "Byron G. Rogers Federal Building and United States Courthouse".

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of H.R. 4700.●

Byron Rogers was a man dedicated to serving his fellow citizens. His career in public office spanned over four decades beginning in 1929 in Bent County, Colo., where he was elected county attorney. From there, he was elected to the Colorado House of Representatives where he served for 4 years, then moved on to serve as the Assistant U.S. Attorney General for Colorado and later the attorney general of Colorado.

In 1950, Byron Rogers was elected to the first of the 10 terms he was to serve in the U.S. House of Representatives. Congressman Rogers was a staunch supporter of the judiciary and civil rights and served on both the Judiciary and Civil Rights Committees. Because of his devotion to the civil rights issue, he became reverently known to all Members as "Old Civil Rights Rogers".

Mr. Speaker, designating the Federal Building and U.S. Post Office in Denver in honor of Byron Rogers is but one small way we can pay tribute to a man who dedicated his life to the citizens throughout the Nation and deserves our support. I urge my colleagues to join me in passing this bill.●

● Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, as author of this legislation, I strongly urge enactment of H.R. 4700.

Briefly, when I came to this Congress 7 years ago, I was fortunate enough to have met Congressman Byron Rogers, who was affectionately known as "The Judge." Byron Rogers served with distinction from the city of Denver for 20 years. He had a long history of political activism and served in the Colorado House of Representatives from 1931 to 1935, before being elected to this body on November 7, 1950.

Congressman Rogers was a man of incredible integrity and intelligence, of commitment and capacity. He was held in high esteem by his colleagues on both sides of the aisle and enjoyed the overwhelming support of his constituents who appreciated his honesty, sincerity, and conscientious concern for their welfare. Byron Rogers loved this institution and continued to reside here for a good portion of the time after he left Congress in 1970 until his recent death.

During his tenure in Congress, he maintained a table down in the Longworth Cafeteria that I am advised that history says was begun by a former distinguished colleague, Mendel Rivers, and that you had an invitation to sit at that breakfast table. Byron Rogers took me under his wing and invited me to sit there and each time I came down for breakfast, the seat to the left was vacant and he always asked me to come up and sit to his left.

Judge Rogers was a Democrat and he took a Republican freshman Congressman under his wing and we talked politics and legislative matters here in the Congress. He was a wealth of knowledge and a delightful person.

Mr. Speaker, passage of this legislation will allow us to pay a small tribute to an outstanding man.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the two bills just passed, H.R. 4665 and H.R. 4700.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

ENDING U.S. PARTICIPATION IN MULTINATIONAL PEACEKEEPING FORCE IN LEBANON

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, the President's letter officially announcing the end of U.S. participation in the multinational peacekeeping force in Lebanon will be well received here on Capitol Hill.

I think most Members of Congress felt our involvement in this ill-conceived mission was over when the marines were redeployed to the safety of U.S. ships offshore.

As this sad chapter in our military history closes, I hope the State Department has learned to never again commit American troops to a no-win situation like the one they faced in Beirut. Our marines should be commended for doing their best to carry out their orders under very difficult circumstances.

There was never a clear understanding of the mission in Beirut. The next time we commit troops, let us make sure the mission is properly defined and we send a large enough force to do the job.

The best thing the State Department can do now is stop trying to lay the blame on someone else and move forward to seek new initiatives for peace in the Middle East.

THE LATE HONORABLE JOE L. EVINS

(Mrs. LLOYD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply saddened to report to the House that the former dean of the Tennessee delegation, the Honorable Joe L. Evins, passed away this weekend. Those of us privileged to serve with him know what an outstanding individual as well as Representative he was. He helped nurture the development of an entire generation of political leadership in the State of Tennessee. He was a dynamic and forceful member of the Appropriations Committee and had much to do with the shaping of legislative programs that laid the basis for economic growth in our State and in our Nation. He was a fine Christian gentleman and for 30 years he exemplified the finest qualities of leadership, compassion, and concern for his country, his State, and for the people who elected him to this body. Tennessee has indeed lost a loyal friend, and trusted servant, with his passing. All of us who knew Joe L. Evins have been touched by his unrelenting spirit to distinguish himself, and this Chamber with his service.

THE LATE HONORABLE JOE L. EVINS

(Mr. COOPER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply saddened today to report that the former Congressman from Tennessee's Fourth District, the Honorable Joe L. Evins, passed away over the weekend. From his first election to Congress in 1946 until his retirement in 1977, Joe L. Evins represented his native State with complete dedication and commitment. His influence in Washington was a great benefit to Tennessee, and his standard of hard work and service for his constituents remains an example of excellence in public service.

Joe L. Evins was also highly respected as a national legislator. As the chairman of the House Small Business Committee for many years, he helped create the SBA and led countless efforts to keep America's small businesses thriving and rewarding for millions of entrepreneurs. Congressman Evins also conceived of numerous public works projects that are now crucial to the country's economy, including the construction of the Interstate System and many TVA dam projects.

Tennessee has lost an outstanding leader. His contributions to our country will be sorely missed.

AIDE RECALLS HOW EVINS MANEUVERED

(By Bill Keel)

When former Rep. Joe L. Evins left Capitol Hill in Washington for a visit to a federal agency or department, officials rolled out the red carpet and braced themselves.

He knew and they knew he controlled the purse strings. They also knew that when he moved, he had a purpose. Evins didn't waste time or motion.

One such visit occurred after passage of the Model Cities Act, which came within the jurisdiction of the independent offices subcommittee on appropriations. He headed for the Department of Housing and Urban Development and then-Secretary Robert Weaver.

Exuding charm and warmth and personality, he swept into Weaver's office.

"Now, Mr. Secretary," he said, "my home county of De Kalb is a prime candidate for the Model Cities program and I urge you to approve its application. You should have a rural county in your program and De Kalb would be ideal. It's a fine progressive county."

Secretary Weaver appeared somewhat puzzled, and I'm not sure at that time whether he had ever heard of Smithville and De Kalb County, Tennessee.

He promised to consider the application and—after a call or two from Evins—announced its approval. He also approved nearby Cookeville. And millions of dollars flowed into the 4th District as a result. Asked by reporters how De Kalb County got into the picture, Weaver said: "Well, she is small, but there are those who love her."

That was the secret of Evins' amazing success in channeling funds to his district and Tennessee. He leveraged his committee positions into instruments of power. He was at one time chairman of two appropriations subcommittees, the House Small Business Committee and the House administration staff, which included the Capitol police. He used this interlocking power base skillfully. For example, he initiated funding for five dams in Tennessee without their being included in any administration budget [Cordell Hull, Percy Priest, Tims Ford, Normandy and Columbia]. He just did it. He had the power.

But it would be wrong to say that he did not have a sense of national mission and national purpose. He did. He approved projects that created jobs and provided public facilities throughout the nation, and when he retired in 1976 congressman after congressman from the Northwest to the Mississippi Delta rose to tell what Joe Evins meant to their states.

He was a master at power escalation—and he taught his administrative assistants how to work with him as a team. One of these, Robert N. Moore Jr. of Franklin, recalls that the contacts would begin with a "light touch" call by the administrative assistants, then a "soft touch" by Evins, then a strong letter, stronger calls, hints of possible funding difficulties—until finally the objective was achieved. There was no Mission Impossible. That just took a little longer for Joe Evins.

He ruled his committees with a firm hand.

On one occasion, Caspar Weinberger, now secretary of defense, appeared before Evins as chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, which just happened to be the agency where Evins had a lot of friends and had worked when he first came to Washington.

One day at a hearing, Weinberger appeared alone.

"Where is your staff, Mr. Chairman?" Evins asked.

"I came alone," Weinberger responded. "That's the way we do it in California."

"Well, it's not the way we do it in Washington," Evins said. "We won't have a hearing until you get your staff here."

In a matter of minutes 18 FTC staffers appeared.

Evins commented recently that back in those days Weinberger was known as "Cap the Knife" because of his budget-cutting activities. Now, Evins said, "Cap the Knife" has become the largest "bureaucratic spender" in history as secretary of defense.

When Evins set his mind on a target, he was relentless in pursuit. He sheathed his power in charm—until he was pushed too far. He could be a tough and grueling cross-examiner in committee.

He had a steel-trap, computer-like mind. Things had to add up. Nothing happened accidentally. There was always a reason for a particular action. One Christmas somebody gave him a ham. He thought about that ham. He didn't know the donor and couldn't understand. In a couple of months, he looked up from his desk and tossed me a letter from a constituent wanting help with a federal problem. "That's where the ham came from," he said.

I once made the mistake of commenting in a book that he couldn't be fooled. He immediately decided that I had tried to fool him at some point. He wracked his brain to figure out why I said that. He finally decided that it went back to an incident involving an old bottle of bourbon that had been sitting in a closet in the office for months. He was not a drinking person and kept it for friends. One day he noticed that the level of the liquid had dropped in the bottle. He asked me about it.

"Well," I responded, "I guess the maid has been nipping."

He howled with laughter, in any event, he concluded that this incident was what I was referring to and that closed the case on Not Being Fooled. Except, that he told that story for years to our mutual friends, intimating that I was the culprit!

He also enjoyed telling about the constituent who wanted the mail route changed to serve his home. After a long, hard struggle, the Post Office agreed. Then the constituent wrote to Evins, saying he wasn't getting any mail and would Evins please get him a federal check so the postman would deliver something.

Evins did not like to put his staff on the spot.

Once, I asked him to have a staff meeting and urge that the staff work harder. He finally agreed. Then after we were all seated in the office he began telling each staff member how lovely and talented she was. "We have our beautiful blond receptionist, and she is very talented. We have our beautiful red-haired secretary, and she is very able. . . ." He never did get to the point.

But he had a priority list each day of objectives to be achieved. And he stuck to it. And the next day we would update the list and take it from there.

He and his wife—Miss Ann, the former Ann Smartt—complemented each other. They were opposites in personality but a perfect match. He was aggressive and dynamic and impatient. She was gentle and patient and serene. They both accepted those differences and accommodated them. If Miss Ann had not finished applying her makeup when Evins thought they should leave for an engagement, she would simply transfer the operation to the car. No problem!

Evins looked back with great pride on his project to help the World War I hero Sgt. Alvin York of Pall Mall, Tenn., to pay off a debt to the Internal Revenue Service. He formed a special committee that included Bobby Kennedy and Gary Cooper, the actor who played Sgt. York in the movie. They raised more than enough to pay off the $25,000 debt for the old war hero.

Evins was not mechanically inclined despite his legislative genius. He sometimes hit the wrong button when he received a telephone call.

He was the World's Most Impatient Man. We used to laugh about that title, and we decided at one point that it should be the title of a book about him.

On one occasion, he actually told me to write a five-minute speech on a matter then on the floor—and without pausing walked right around to another door to my office and asked: "Have you got it ready?"

A week ago he wrote a letter to an old friend, Bryan Jacques in Arlington, Va., in which he said:

"I'm eating well and my strength is returning. But sometimes an old car ceases to run well. It takes a lot of little repair jobs to keep it going—and I am a 1910 model."

Later in the week, he told his old friend Charles Gentry, a Church of Christ minister from Smithville, to pull a chair over by the bed at Vanderbilt Hospital for a talk.

He was serene and calm.

"Charlie," he said, "people don't realize how much pain I have had. I want to get away from all this suffering. I'm ready to go."

He had his way one last time.

(Bill Keel, a federal and political consultant, was administrative assistant to Rep. Joe Evins for 11 years.)

LEGACY OF MR. JOE L. EVINS

The death of Mr. Joe L. Evins on Saturday removes from the scene one of Tennessee's most gifted and devoted public servants. He died after suffering a heart attack at the age of 73.

Mr. Evins was elected to represent the 4th congressional district in 1946 and served 30 years before retiring. He was a native of DeKalb County, and a graduate of Vanderbilt University and Cumberland Law School. Prior to being elected to Congress, he worked for the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. Evin's contributions both to his congressional district and to the state are numerous. He was directly responsible for bringing hospitals, schools, airports, and highways into his district. He helped get the funding for the Veterans Administration Hospital in Nashville, and also helped create the Small Business Administration.

But Mr. Evins did not limit his concerns and his energy to Tennessee. During his congressional career, he has one persistent theme—"Building America." And, as a member of the Appropriations Committee and chairman of the Subcommittee on Public Works Appropriations, he had the ability to achieve that goal.

His voice and influence helped bring water projects to irrigate the West, helped bring energy to bolster industry in southern states, and facilitated the building of numerous health facilities throughout the nation.

He also was a great supporter of the national space program. Because of the persistent and imaginative assistance in the moon landing and the projects that proceeded it. Mr. Evins' name is engraved on a plaque on the moon.

Few members of Congress have been responsible for such a collection of national projects. And few persons have ever made such a permanent impact on this state. Mr. Evins fused his energy, skills, and knowledge with an absolute devotion to the state and the nation. His achievements are a legacy for which all Tennesseans may be proud.

CONSEQUENCES OF AFDC CUTS

(Mr. FORD of Tennessee asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the GAO report on the effect of the 1981 budget cuts in AFDC confirms what we have been told in congressional hearings for the last 2 years—these cuts have resulted in unwarranted pain and hardship for poor single mothers who are struggling to support their families. This report stands in sharp contrast to the ridiculous anecdotal statements from the administration that ignore the harsh reality of poverty in this country.

These budget cuts, which substantially reduced the amount of money an AFDC recipient could earn and still remain eligible for assistance, have resulted in 493,000 families losing AFDC. In most cases, this means not only the loss of income assistance but also of health care coverage through the medicaid program. Nearly 1,000,000 children were affected by these cuts.

The indepth study, conducted in Memphis, Dallas, Boston, Milwaukee, and Syracuse, shows that the cuts were directed at the working AFDC recipient. While in many cases it might have made more economic sense for these individuals to quit work, the study shows that they have remained in their jobs. These women want to work and achieve economic self-sufficiency. In so many cases, the assistance provided by AFDC meant at least a minimal standard of living for them and their families. These budget cuts have played a cruel joke on these families. In effect, these cuts say that it is the policy of this Government that these women and children live in poverty.

While these women have remained in the work force, the study shows that they have not been able to make up the loss of income assistance and medicaid coverage. The average monthly income loss for working single parent families who lost AFDC eligibility was $186 in Memphis, $229 in Dallas, $180 in Milwaukee, $151 in Syracuse, and $115 in Boston. For many of these families, the AFDC income loss coincided with the loss of food stamp eligibility because of tightened eligibility in that program.

Lack of health coverage was common among these former AFDC recipients. In Dallas, 59.2 percent of those families who lost AFDC did not have any health coverage. In Memphis, 45 percent, in Boston, 27.5 percent, in Syracuse, 17.1 percent, and in Milwaukee, 13.9 percent had no health coverage at all. Private health insurance coverage was more common in high benefit States.

The study also found that in four of the cities these families were more likely to have faced emergency situations as a result of these cuts. Many have had to forgo medical treatment or were refused medical treatment because they could not pay. They have had to borrow money from friends and relatives in order to meet expenses. They have run out of food before the end of the month and have had to depend on charity for food.

This report, coming as it does shortly after the Bureau of the Census report on the alarming rise in poverty, provides substantial evidence of the systematic retreat from our obligation to insure economic and social justice for all citizens. The policies of this administration have led the retreat. It is time for the simplistic rhetoric and cynicism of the administration to stop and for compassionate leadership from the White House in addressing the needs of the poor to begin.

ANNUAL CHILI DAY EXTRAVAGANZA

(Mr. PICKLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, today's the day we give chili away—venison chili that is—from the hill country of Texas. This delicacy of the wild is a rare treat. This marks the 16th year that I have served "Wick-Fowler" two-alarm venison chili to the House, and I am pleased to tell the Members that, out of deference to gringos, this will only be two-alarm chili—not the three-alarm or four-alarm chili that we Texans are used to.

And furthermore, we have cut the "red pepper" portions so everyone can enjoy this delicacy without fear of intestinal recriminations.

Today, there are a lot of so-called chili experts and chili cookoffs, but I promise you, this chili is the right stuff. There is just no comparison. So, put on your best asbestos suit, save a little room for ice cream for calming purposes, and help yourself, but remember—"caveat emptor."

And let no one but the brave venture forth for this "two-alarm" venison chili.

THE 2-PERCENT SOLUTION

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of the Texas chili, a group of us have submitted under the rules of the House a budget for consideration by the House this week.

Our criticism of alternative budgets is that some do not go far enough. For example, the President spoke of $100 billion downpayment, leaving deficits higher in the third year than in the first year.

Some budgets take all their cuts in defense or in raising taxes. We do not think that is the right approach.

Finally, some budgets do all their deficit reduction with mirrors. We have heard of one where there will be large savings from the Grace Commission, savings that frankly do not exist.

We ask Members to take a look at our budget. It is tough, fair, and broad. We call it the 2-percent solution.

We allow military to grow at 5 percent real; that is, 2 percent under what the President wants. We take COLA's minus 2 percent on an annual basis. We reduce indexing by 2 percent.

The result, Mr. Speaker, is a savings of $225 billion in 3 years from current services, 2-to-1 spending over tax increases.

We think, Mr. Speaker, that our budget, if adopted by this House this week, will lower interest rates by 2 percent real across the board. That will allow the recovery to prolong itself; that will extend economic recovery to areas that do not get help now like agriculture, and reduce unemployment.

We ask Members of the House to look at the 2-percent solution.

BIG DEFICITS ARE A FACT OF LIFE

(Mr. GEPHARDT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I want to say some kind words about one budget plan that we will be debating here in the next few weeks. I think the plan approved by the House Budget Committee is a major step forward. If enacted, it will send a message to both Main Street and Wall Street that Congress is serious about getting the deficit under control. If it fails, we will be accused of dodging the most important economic problem our Nation faces today.

Big deficits are a fact of life. They will be with us for some years to come despite our best efforts. The choice we face is whether to pay for what we are getting or continue the spend and spend, borrow and borrow policy.

Our budget is attractive for several reasons. It is a virtual freeze, designed to hold spending down during this austere period. It embraces the pay-as-you-go principle. This will establish an important precedent and be an official congressional acknowledgement that there is no free lunch. Last, it calls for sacrifice in a fair way in all parts of the budget.

I urge my colleagues to study this budget carefully and vote for it when it reaches the floor.

WE ARE LIVING ON BORROWED TIME

(Mr. FAZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, the No. 1 economic problem facing our Nation today is the deficit. To solve it we can not longer afford lipservice because the national debt, which will reach $1.6 trillion by the end of this year, will by 1990 amount to $11,000 for every man, woman, and child in our country.

The interest payments alone will then be $20 billion; triple what they were in 1981. The President says we no longer have to fear the deficit, that the economy is now booming; that the expansion will take care of the deficit. But this just is not the case.

Despite the momentum of our economy, we are living on borrowed time. As Alan Greenspan, Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President Ford put it, as long as the financial markets perceive, as they do today, that the deficit potential for causing crowding out is large, they will impose inflation premiums on interest rates, ultimately they will undercut growth.

We have seen in recent days that interest rates already high in real terms are on the move, rising higher still in the future.

That is why we need to support the resolution that the House Budget Committee has labored long and hard to develop. Our plan will reduce the deficit by $182 billion over the next 3 years, more than any other plan yet discussed. This is a reasonable, well-thought out plan.

House Concurrent Resolution 282 is a solid beginning to what will be a long-term plan to address these deficits which threaten our economic well-being over the next several decades.

OLDER AMERICANS HAVE A RIGHT TO LIVE AND TO RECEIVE MEDICAL TREATMENT

(Mr. PETRI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PETRI. Mr. Speaker, last week we all discovered that there is yet another Colorado Democrat with "new ideas."

Many of us were surprised and dismayed to learn that Colorado Gov. Richard Lamm believes the terminally ill elderly have what he called a, and I quote, "duty to die and get out of the way."

Mr. Speaker, it is a frightening thing to suggest that anybody has a duty to die. And it is even more frightening to hear that suggestion from a high government official, such as the Governor of Colorado.

Because we have a Governor who feels free to tell our elderly that they have a duty to die, I have decided to offer an amendment to the Older Americans Act to help educate our senior citizens about their legal rights. No matter what the Governor of Colorado says, our older Americans have a right to live and to receive medical treatment. God will take them soon enough. There is no need to help push them over the precipice.

EL SALVADOR—ATROCIOUS ACTS OF LEFTWING DEATH SQUADS DEMAND EQUAL CONDEMNATION

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, we continually hear about the atrocities committed by the so-called death squads in El Salvador. Unfortunately, the impression has been that the rightwing has some sort of monopoly on the death squad activities. As much as I and my colleagues deplore the rightwing death squads, the atrocious acts of the leftwing death squads demand equal condemnation.

Since June 1983, five elected Salvadoran Assembly Members have been killed, all Conservative Party members. At least three of these assassinations have been claimed by leftist groups. If a similar proportion of Members of Congress had been killed, we would have lost 36. No one in this body would tolerate the loss of one Member, nor should we stand by without condemning the senseless killings of legislators in a freely elected assembly in another country and just yesterday guerrillas killed D'Aubisson's chief campaign adviser Rafael Hasbun.

There are also recent reports of a large band of Cuban- and Libyan-trained terrorists infiltrating El Salvador from Nicaragua, with the purpose of murdering presidential candidate Napoleon Duarte, among other prominent Salvadorans. While in El Salvador, as part of the official U.S. delegation to oversee the presidential elections on March 25, we were advised that, indeed, Libyans and Cubans had infiltrated the country for that purpose.

Other information has come to light recently which casts grave doubts about the allegations of former U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador Robert White, who has charged certain Salvadorans with participation, direction, and financing of death squad activities. When confronted with certain evidence which discredits his statements or libel suits challenging his assertions, Mr. White has retracted his claims, stating "it appears my source may have been in error."

Mr. Speaker, the continued flagrant violations of human rights by leftwing terrorist groups in El Salvador cannot be tolerated. Following my visit to El Salvador in December with Vice President BUSH, the number of deaths related to rightwing death squads has dropped considerably. Just as we deplored and condemned the rightwing death squads, so must we condemn those of the left as well.

THE ERA-ABORTION CONNECTION IS AFFIRMED

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, last year, when the House of Representatives was debating the equal rights amendment, proponents of the same old ERA that failed of ratification several years ago argued that there was no connection between the ERA and legalized abortion and that there was no need for an abortion neutral amendment to the ERA. At the time, those favoring an abortion neutral amendment to ERA disputed that analysis, pointing to a number of cases that had been filed in the courts of States that had adopted State ERA's. However, those concerned about the ERA-abortion connection could not, at that particular moment, point to a case where a State court had ruled that the State's ERA required medicaid funding of abortion on demand—because no definitive rulings had been handed down.

Well, now those concerned about the ERA-abortion connection can point to a case—Fisher against Commonwealth of Pennsylvania—decided March 9, 1984, and the ruling substantiates all their concerns. By deciding that the Pennsylvania State ERA mandates medicaid funding of abortion on demand, Judge John McPhail has demonstrated that the threat of federally funded abortion if the same old ERA passes is every bit as real as critics have made it out to be.

As a consequence, I would certainly hope that, if the ERA is brought back to the House floor, it be brought back under a rule that will permit the offering of amendments and, in particular, an abortion neutral amendment. The need for such an amendment can no longer be in doubt.

TWO "OLD" IDEAS WHOSE TIME HAS COME

(Mr. WEBER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEBER. I thank the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, in the campaign which we are hearing a lot about new ideas, I would like to raise again two ideas that take on a special relevance as we enter a week of discussions on the budget resolution.

I am referring to the idea of a balanced budget constitutional amendment and the idea of a line-item veto.

Granted, those ideas probably do not sound too new to the Members of this body since many of us have tried to bring them up on every single day that this House has been in session. But unfortunately, those two new ideas do not seem to get much of a hearing from the Democratic majority.

Once again, I come to the floor today because we have minority approval of a unanimous-consent request to bring the balanced budget constitutional amendment and the line-item veto to the floor for debate and a vote.

If we had the support of the majority, we could act on those items expeditiously.

Obviously, unfortunately, that approval is not forthcoming.

So once again, as we enter a week in which we will be debating the crucial issues of the Federal budget deficit, we find that the Democratic leadership of the House has blocked consideration of the line-item veto as well as the balanced budget constitutional amendment.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

(Mrs. VUCANOVICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of the voluntary school prayer constitutional amendment.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make this request I must have the clearance of the majority and minority leaderships.

This request has been cleared by the minority leadership. I would be willing to yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Hearing no response, that should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of voluntary school prayer, the Democratic leadership of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

PAYROLL DEDUCTION FACILITATION ACT

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 3879) to amend title 31, United States Code, to eliminate the fee imposed on financial organizations which receive payroll deductions from Federal employees, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Payroll Deduction Facilitation Act".

ELIMINATION OF PAYROLL DEDUCTION FEES ON FINANCIAL ORGANIZATIONS

SEC. 2. Section 3332(b) of title 31, United States Code, is amended by inserting "without charge" after "shall be sent".

SEC. 3. Section 3332 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by striking out subsection (c) and redesignating subsections (d), (e), (f), and (g) as subsections (c), (d), (e), and (f), respectively.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR).

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3879 was jointly referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. On March 28, 1984, the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee unanimously approved H.R. 3879 with an amendment, and the Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee, has no objection of the consideration of the bill by the House. The amendment was to delete section 4 in its entirety. It was felt that this section was unnecessary to the thrust of the legislation and creates difficult issues concerning the right to privacy which are not relevant to the remainder of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3879 would amend section 3332 of the United States Code, regarding payroll deductions for Federal civilian employees. Under current law, the Federal Government imposes service charges on financial institutions and organizations which receive payroll deductions from Federal workers.

Current law requires that Federal agencies be reimbursed for the administrative cost of processing payroll allotments. The number of deductions an employee can make per paycheck is limited to three. The Federal Government absorbs the cost of sending one allotment per pay period to an employee's designated financial organization. However, if other deductions are made, the appropriate Federal agency must be reimbursed by the designated financial organization for the costs involved in processing these deductions. In effect, Federal employees are permitted to designate up to three allotments with charges incurred on the second and third.

Under existing law, these fees apply only to payroll deductions for Federal civilian employees. Active and retired military personnel and Department of Defense personnel living overseas may authorize payroll deductions at no cost to them or their recipient organization.

I believe that this is totally unfair and must be corrected. Frankly, it defies logic to try to defend a Government policy which supposedly encourages savings and thrift, but penalizes Federal employees for doing the very thing this Government has encouraged them to do—save.

Mr. Speaker, how ironic it is that we in the Congress, on the one hand enact legislation such as the individual retirement account and other saving provisions, and yet, on the other hand, we impose an impediment on our loyal Federal employees who want to save by requiring the Federal Government to charge their designated financial institution the cost of processing the saving allotment. It simply does not make any sense and H.R. 3879 corrects this inequity.

By eliminating the allotment fee charged to financial institutions serving civilian employees, H.R. 3879 will improve Government efficiency and aid the Department of the Treasury in making full use of the advanced technology of electronic funds transfer. Moreover, testimony received from Treasury Department officials by the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits indicates that 75 million allotments are processed each year. Of these, 64 million are composite checks, which cost the Treasury Department about 3 cents per check—11 million are individual checks which cost about 21 cents per check. By removing the fee requirement, the Treasury Department will be able to fully utilize electronic fund transfers for these transactions at a gross annual savings of $4.4 million. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that net savings of $2 million per year will result with enactment of H.R. 3879.

Furthermore, this legislation will also provide uniformity for all allotment programs and end the current confusion in the financial community caused by the imposition of these fees which are inconsistent with the procedures used for other Government programs.

Over the years, payroll deductions have proved to be an effective and efficient means of encouraging savings for all citizens. It is a sure method by which they can contribute to an overall improvement in our economy. Congress should do all it possibly can to encourage thrift and savings. It is for this reason that H.R. 3879, as amended is timely and on target. In addition, it is a measure that will result in cost savings to our Government and aid in reducing the staggering deficit that we now face.

Mr. Speaker, I am deeply grateful to the chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, Mr. FORD, and the chairman of the Banking Committee, Mr. ST GERMAIN, for their support of H.R. 3879. I am also pleased to note that the bill is supported by the Treasury Department, the major credit union organizations, and other financial institutions.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this legislation.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume. I join the distinguished Chair of the Compensation and Employee Benefits Subcommittee in urging swift approval of this bill.

This bill modestly reduces our deficit, encourages Federal employees to save, and ends a cumbersome billing practice. This bill has bipartisan support in our committee and is strongly endorsed by the administration.

As the gentlelady from Ohio has noted, this bill eliminates the current fee of 6 cents per electronic fund transfer levied by the Treasury Department on financial institutions for civilian Federal payroll allotments. While this fee raised $2.1 million, it cost $4.4 million to administer. This practice was also inconsistent with the private sector.

It is also important to note what this bill does not contain. This bill was amended in subcommittee to delete a provision long sought by the Treasury Department to permit the disclosure of very limited information on accounts receiving Federal deposits by wire. The purpose was to insure proper crediting of accounts and to track the fraudulent use of Federal transfer payments. This provision was not the idea of the gentlelady from Ohio.

My concern, and that of my colleague from Florida (Mr. MACK), was that we could insure proper crediting and reach these fraud cases through other means without compromising the rightful privacy of any employee who has Federal deposits wired into their accounts. I am pleased to say that the gentlelady from Ohio was as responsive to our concern as she was cooperative with the Treasury Department.

The minority appreciates the prompt action of the gentlelady from Ohio and the chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD), in moving this legislation.

I have no requests for further time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume to urge my colleagues to support the bill unanimously. It is a time that we can save a lot of money and at the same time do a service to our Federal employees who deserve it.

GENERAL LEAVE

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and to include extraneous matter on the bill, H.R. 3879.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentlewoman from Ohio (Ms. OAKAR) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 3879, as amended.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill, as amended, was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTROLLED SUBSTANCE REGISTRANT PROTECTION ACT OF 1984

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5222) to amend title 18, United States Code, to make certain robberies and burglaries involving controlled substances a Federal offense.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The table of sections for chapter 103 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following new item:

"2118. Robberies and burglaries involving controlled substances."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the rule, a second is not required on this motion.

The gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SAWYER) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES).

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary has favorably reported the bill, H.R. 5222, the Controlled Substances Registrants Protection Act of 1984. The bill provides specific authority to the Department of Justice to investigate and prosecute robberies and burglaries of controlled substances from persons who are registered with the Drug Enforcement Administration, pursuant to the Controlled Substances Act.

Robbery and burglary of controlled substances is a serious problem. DEA reported that between 1977 and 1981, there were close to 6,000 such crimes annually. The frequency of these crimes has terrorized the community of dispensing pharmacists. As a consequence, enormous quantities of controlled substances are diverted to the black market and the lives of thousands of pharmacy employees and customers are endangered.

Some pharmacists have ceased to carry the drugs which are highly desired on the black market, although this interferes with their patients' ability to obtain necessary medicine. This has a serious potential to impede the delivery of health care in many communities around the Nation.

Pharmacy robbery and burglary are very serious State crimes and are usually best pursued by State and local law enforcement agencies.

However, there are robberies and burglaries of federally controlled substances which involve death or serious bodily injury, or thousands of dollars of controlled substances, or which have a significant interstate element. Those cases require appropriate Federal action.

Consequently, the committee has approved legislation to provide backup to the States in those cases which may exceed the ability, resources, or jurisdictional reach of State or local law enforcement agencies.

This bill has the strong support of almost the entire pharmacy and health care industry including the American Pharmaceutical Association, the National Association of Chain Drug Stores, and the National Wholesale Druggists Association.

Our 600,000 controlled substances registrants need to know that Federal protection will be forthcoming when it is appropriate.

I urge the adoption of this bill.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, because only licensed pharmacies are able to dispense controlled substances, they appear as prime targets for persons interested in drugs for personal use or theft of drugs for profit. DEA reports that from January 1983 through March 1983, there were 342 armed robberies and 1,953 thefts of controlled substances from DEA registrants. This type of violent crime is just another example of the drug trafficking problem in the United States.

Six out of every ten emergency room drug abuse cases involve legally manufactured drugs that have been diverted from proper use. This Nation has a serious drug abuse problem with pharmaceutical drugs that many of us, unfortunately, have overlooked in the past. The bill before us today will permit the Federal law enforcement community to assist in stopping the most dangerous form of drug diversion the pharmacy robbery. In this instance, the lives of the pharmacists and their customers are at stake, as well as the ultimate drug abuser. H.R. 5222 is only one of the two drug diversion bills before the Subcommittee on Crime and I commend Chairman HUGHES for processing legislation to address the pharmaceutical drug abuse problem in this Nation.

I urge your support for H.R. 5222, which makes it a Federal crime to take controlled substances from a pharmacy or drug wholesaler. This legislation is carefully crafted to reflect an appropriately limited Federal role in pharmacy robberies and burglaries to avoid usurping the jurisdiction of State and local authorities.

By working with local law enforcement officials, I believe the DEA and FBI agents can help reduce pharmacy crime under the provisions of H.R. 5222.

This pharmacy crime legislation before us today is the result of a lot of work on the part of Mr. HUGHES, the Department of Justice, and pharmacists across this Nation. The Subcommittee on Crime is indebted to HENRY HYDE, who introduced pharmacy crime legislation and has worked heartily in support of Federal penalties for those who take controlled substances from pharmacies for several years. Mr. HYDE testified before our subcommittee and his staff has offered invaluable assistance to myself and the subcommittee staff during our consideration of pharmacy crime legislation.

Mr. HYDE could not be with us today, but he asked me to submit his remarks in support of this bill, which I am most happy to do.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

I just want to take this opportunity to express my sincere appreciation to the ranking minority member on the Subcommittee on Crime for his diligence and his good work in seeing this legislation advance. I join with my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan, in echoing sentiments to the effect that the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. HYDE) has been right there working very hard to see this legislation through. I know that he has been working for the last 2½ years, endeavoring to see some pharmacy robbery legislation advanced in the Congress. I am very happy that he is supportive of the legislation and that we are able to move it at this time.

May I also say, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN), has been very, very supportive of the legislation. The gentleman had legislation before his subcommittee which parallels this legislation and is one of the prime sponsors of the bill before us.

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Crime Subcommittee and a cosponsor of an earlier version (H.R. 1255) of this legislation and a cosponsor of this bill, I rise in strong support of H.R. 5222, the Controlled Substance Registrants Protection Act.

I first want to thank my able subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES), for guiding this legislation through the legislative process. Thanks also must go to our ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. SAWYER), who has announced his retirement. His presence and cooperative spirit will be missed next year.

Mr. Speaker, no Federal statute specifically addresses theft from pharmacies and other places that house controlled substances. According to the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), the reported robberies of controlled substances increased by 160 percent between 1973 and 1981. In Florida alone there were 96 pharmacy break-ins and 42 armed robberies and break-ins in 1982. The total dosage units stolen during such pharmacy robberies and break-ins was over 575,000. Clearly the time has come for Congress to address specifically this problem.

Robberies and burglaries already are covered by State law. In pharmacy crimes, however, the materials being sought is specifically controlled by Federal statute. That is why the Judiciary Committee believes that H.R. 5222 is necessary.

The bill provides three alternative bases for Federal jurisdiction. The replacement value of the drugs taken must be at least $500. The perpetrator must have used some means of interstate commerce in committing the crime. Or, an innocent person must have been killed or seriously injured. Under the bill's provisions, the robbery or burglary is punished by 20 years in jail and/or a $25,000 fine. If death should occur during the commission of the felony, the punishment is life imprisonment and/or a $50,000 fine. Finally, conspiracy to commit the crime is punishable by 10 years in jail and/or a $25,000 fine.

Enactment of H.R. 5222 will not mean that pharmacy crimes will diminish or that Federal jurisdiction will be assumed in every instance. The local U.S. attorney still will have to decide whether to prosecute the case or not. But, H.R. 5222 is a statement by the Congress of the importance with which we view robberies of pharmacies. In addition, actual deterrence may depend ultimately upon knowledge that the Federal Government may prosecute the robbery of a pharmacy.

Mr. Speaker, pharmacies provide a great service to the community. Because of the danger of robberies of the controlled substances within their premises, some pharmacists have erected barriers for themselves. They work behind cages or locked doors and windows. These dedicated professionals persist in being pharmacists because they are dedicated to their community and their business. Florida already has dealt with this problem by making it a crime to commit a robbery in a pharmacy. It is time for Federal Government to do likewise.

I urge the House to pass H.R. 5222.●

● Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, few things are more terrifying than being an innocent bystander caught in the middle of an armed robbery of a pharmacy.

DEA statistics indicate that 342 armed robberies of controlled substances from pharmacies occurred in the first 3 months of 1983 alone.

Many people have overlooked the tremendous pharmaceutical drug abuse problem in the United States. Pharmacy crime is one way to obtain these legally manufactured drugs.

There is tremendous profit potential in pharmacy crime. For example, dilaudid (a synthetic heroin) pill costs the pharmacist about 25 cents. On the street, dilaudid pills sell for about $40 to $60 each.

H.R. 5222 allows Federal law enforcement involvement where DEA and FBI agents can make a contribution to the case. Federal jurisdiction comes into play when over $500 of drugs are taken (wholesale value), or when the offender travels in interstate commerce or when a person is killed or seriously injured.

This legislation is based in large part on the hard work of Mr. HYDE and Mr. JEPSEN in support of pharmacy crime legislation. I commend Chairman HUGHES and Mr. SAWYER for their efforts in moving this legislation in the House.●

● Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill and wish to commend the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES) and the gentleman from California (Mr. WAXMAN) for moving this legislation. Like a number of other Members of the House, I introduced a bill on this subject, H.R. 3974, and so am very pleased that we are acting today to provide long overdue protection for the Nation's pharmacists against robberies and burglaries of controlled substances.

I would like to recognize the valuable work of the pharmacy industry in behalf of this legislation, in particular the work of the National Association of Retail Druggists, which has worked for legislation of this type for more than 10 years.

This legislation will close a serious loophole in Federal drug statutes. Under current law, it is a Federal criminal offense to manufacture, distribute, dispense, or obtain narcotics or other controlled substances except through properly registered channels, or to obtain such substances by misrepresentation, fraud, forgery, deception, or subterfuge.

Under the current Federal law, however, it is not a criminal offense to obtain narcotics or controlled substances by robbing or burglarizing a pharmacy. Since 1973, more than 10,000 pharmacies have been robbed to obtain controlled substances, and more than 2,300 people have been killed or injured in such robberies. In addition, the rate of these robberies is increasing dramatically—up 113 percent between 1976 and 1981. Burglary and theft of controlled substances from pharmacies also increased significantly.

As a former U.S. attorney, I do have several reservations about how well this bill will actually protect our pharmacists. I fear that the inconsistency between the bill's language and the Controlled Substances Act and with provisions of the Criminal Code, particularly the antitampering statute which was recently enacted, may limit the effectiveness of the protection we are trying to extend.

The bill defines pharmacy robbery and burglary in language very similar to that used by the Criminal Code to define bank robbery and burglary. The bill's offense definitions go on, however, to require the Government to prove one of three additional conditions in order to obtain a conviction: First, that the crime involved more than $500 of a controlled substance, valued at replacement cost; that is, wholesale; or second, that an instrumentality of interstate commerce was used in committing the offense; or third, that death or serious bodily injury occurred as a result of the offense.

These limitations are inconsistent with the Controlled Substances Act and will have an ironic result. Under the CSA, obtaining controlled substances by nonviolent means such as forgery is a Federal offense regardless of the amount obtained, or whether instrumentalities of interstate commerce are used. Unfortunately, the restrictive definitions in this bill will mean that under Federal law stealing controlled substances with a ballpoint pen is of greater concern than taking them with a revolver. That result is silly, and in view of the ample nexus controlled substances already have with interstate commerce, unnecessary.

The bill's limitation on death or serious bodily injury is also inconsistent with the recently enacted antitampering statute. The language of that bill was amended by the Judiciary Committee in order to assure that tampering with consumer products which threatened but did not actually result in bodily injury would also be punished by that statute. Our failure to make similar adjustments here may unintentionally penalize good police work by allowing unsuccessful felons to escape Federal prosecution, regardless of the wishes of State or local law enforcement authorities.

I hope these concerns are addressed in the conference committee.●

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, as one who has advocated pharmacy crime legislation since the 96th Congress, I am pleased to support this legislation which will see to it that our Nation's pharmacists, and indeed all DEA registrants, have the Federal protection they must have if they are to continue dispensing necessary drugs to their customers with any sense of security.

I particularly want to commend the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime, Mr. HUGHES, and HAROLD SAWYER, ranking Republican on the subcommittee, for their efforts to resolve many questions which arose during consideration of legislation. The HUGHES' bill, H.R. 5222, is a good bill, and one which I feel deserves my colleagues' unanimous support.

Those who have devoted considerable time and effort to this issue over the years fully recognize the delicate balance which exists—and which must be maintained—if we are to see legislation signed into law in this Congress. As we all know, politics is the art of compromise, and nowhere is that more evident than in the legislation before us today.

In addition to expressing my sincere thanks to Chairman HUGHES and HAROLD SAWYER, I also want to particularly thank subcommittee counsel, Hayden Gregory and Eric Sterling. Charlene Van Lier, Republican counsel for the subcommittee, has provided outstanding advice and counsel. Particularly helpful and welcome has been the support, encouragement, and well-reasoned suggestions by the National Association of Chain Drug Stores and the National Wholesale Druggists Association.

Last but certainly not least, I wish to thank those of my colleagues who have steadfastly cosponsored legislation on this issue which I have introduced in the last two Congresses. It was their continued support since the 96th Congress which provided the strength to continue the fight on behalf of those throughout the country who dispense controlled substances. I am convinced that their support has been crucial in our efforts to provide an appropriate Federal response to a rapidly increasing problem.

I urge speedy adoption of H.R. 5222, and call my colleagues' attention to the following list of cosponsors of H.R. 1255, the Controlled Substances Act, legislation which preceded H.R. 5222.

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5222, the Controlled Substance Registrant Protection Act of 1984.

The theft of controlled substances from our Nation's pharmacies is a matter of great concern to the members of the Energy and Commerce Committee.

Retail diversion of controlled substances presents a major threat to public health. Fifty percent of drug abuse-related death and injuries are the result of drugs legally available for use in medicine which are diverted to illicit use. Robberies from our Nation's pharmacies result in the diversion of millions of drug dosage units to the street. In addition to contributing to our Nation's drug abuse problem, these acts present a serious risk of death and injury to pharmacy personnel and their customers.

Earlier last month the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment ordered legislation reported which would, in a fashion similar to H.R. 5222, impose strict criminal penalties on the robbery or burglary of controlled substances from retail pharmacies and other Federal registrants. In view of the similarities between H.R. 5222 and our subcommittee's action, I am pleased to support and cosponsor the pending proposal and to urge our Senate colleagues to give it their support.

I would like to recognize two members of our subcommittee who deserve credit for their tireless efforts in this area. The gentleman from Ohio (Mr. LUKEN) and the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BLILEY) have been persuasive advocates on behalf of our Nation's pharmacists and the public they serve.

I also want to praise the efforts of the gentleman from New Jersey and the principal author of H.R. 5222, Mr. HUGHES, for his commitment to pursue enactment of this legislation in such a timely fashion.

Mr. Speaker, extending Federal law enforcement protections in this area is long overdue. Passage of H.R. 5222 makes good sense and I urge each Member's support.●

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5222, the Controlled Substance Registrant Protection Act of 1984. This legislation is an important step forward in controlling the diversion of large quantities of dangerous drugs from the legitimate channels of commerce to the streets and the black market where they get into the hands of drug addicts.

Unfortunately it is not a well-known fact that legitimately manufactured drugs are the cause of three-quarters of the deaths and injuries due to drug abuse in our country. It is a tragedy that these important pharmaceutical products, which are so essential to provide relief for pain of those who are critically ill, are diverted by various means to the drug pushers who sell them for enormous profits.

For example, the drug Dilaudid, widely used to relieve severe pain, has a wholesale dosage unit price of 27 cents. That same pill can be sold on the street for $40 or $50. As a consequence, Mr. Speaker, a bottle of 100 pills which a pharmacist purchases for $27 is worth $4,000 or more. This value, greater than its weight in gold, has led to thousands of robberies and burglaries of pharmacies, doctors offices, and other health care facilities every year. These robberies pose a severe danger that health care delivery will be totally interrupted in certain communities. Pharmacists in many parts of the country, particularly in the inner city where crime is often high, have simply stopped carrying these important drugs in their inventory.

The result is that the elderly, the infirm, the seriously ill, and bedridden are often greatly inconvenienced when trying to get the medicines they desperately need. Tragically, these burdens sometimes are so great that the necessary pain killing medicine cannot be obtained at all.

Mr. Speaker, this important legislation provides necessary Federal jurisdiction to protect the commerce in controlled substances from robbery and burglary. As developed by the Judiciary Committee this legislation spells out for the Department of Justice those important classes of cases which warrant Federal assistance to State and local investigations.

I urge the adoption of this bill.●

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of H.R. 5222, the Controlled Substance Registrant Protection Act of 1984. This bill provides specific authority to the Department of Justice to investigate and prosecute robberies and burglaries of controlled substances from persons who are registered with the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA).

Robbery and burglary of controlled substances are clearly a serious problem. DEA reported that between 1977 and 1981 there were close to 6,000 such crimes annually. The frequency of these crimes has terrorized the community of pharmacists. Some pharmacists have ceased to carry drugs that are highly desired on the black market, although this interferes with their patients' ability to obtain necessary medicine. This has the serious potential to impede the delivery of health care in many communities around the Nation.

Pharmacists are a key link in our ability to provide adequate health care, especially in rural areas. While most pharmacists no longer mix their own powders or prepare their own capsules, they are by no means simply pill counters. Pharmacists are really part educator, part health care provider, and part merchant. They may often be more accessible to patients than are doctors and can provide invaluable information to people about how medications should be taken, what side effects to expect and what potential interactions they may have with other drugs, alcohol, or food. People depend upon their pharmacists to be able to supply medication at all hours of the day or night for sick children or relatives. People look to their pharmacists for guidance regarding what symptoms to report back to their doctor. According to a recent issue of America's Health, pharmacists now rank high in public opinion polls for honesty and ethical standards, second only to members of the clergy in this regard.

It is for these reasons that I believe we cannot allow pharmacists to leave their profession due to the fear of crime.

At present, pharmacy robbery and burglary are already very serious State crimes and are usually best pursued by State and local law enforcement agencies. However, in some cases, the local authorities do not have sufficient resources to pursue some cases properly. This is especially true when criminal groups covering several States are involved. Consequently, this legislation, which I am proud to have cosponsored, is drafted to provide a backup to the States in those cases which may exceed the ability of State and local law enforcement agencies. H.R. 5222 creates two new title 18 offenses: Robbery of and burglary with intent to steal controlled substances from registrants with DEA under the Controlled Substances Act. H.R. 5222 also provides for penalties of a 20-year prison term and $25,000 fine, or life imprisonment and a $50,000 fine in the event death occurs in the commission of the offense.

Many groups have lent their support to this measure, including the American Pharmaceutical Association, the American Veterinary Medical Association, the National Wholesale Druggists' Association, the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, and the American Dental Association. I hope that other Members of Congress will support this bill to protect pharmacists and to enable them to continue to serve the needs of the people in this country.●

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I urge this body to support and pass H.R. 5222, the Controlled Substance Registrant Protection Act of 1984. This important bill will protect pharmacists and their customers across this Nation from persons who rob and burglarize these pharmacies to obtain controlled substances. As the sponsor of H.R. 1032, a bill to make pharmacy robbery a Federal crime, I appreciate the importance of this legislation, and have cosponsored H.R. 5222, the bill before us today.

H.R. 5222 is endorsed by the National Association of Chain Drug Stores, the National Wholesale Druggists Association, the American Pharmaceutical Association, the Drug Wholesalers Association, the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association, and the Food Marketing Institute.

Pharmacies are sitting ducks for addicts or drug traffickers who are willing to risk the lives of pharmacists and customers in order to get their hands on controlled substances. One unfortunate result of pharmacy robbery is that some pharmacies no longer carry the controlled substances that legitimate customers need. This is deplorable.

I am happy to support legislation which permits Federal involvement in pharmacy robbery investigations where the Federal officials can contribute to the case.●

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity, as both a Member of this distinguished body and a pharmacist, to rise in support of legislation to amend the Controlled Substances Act. H.R. 5222 will make it a Federal crime to obtain controlled substances from a pharmacy by force or violence.

There is no doubt that violent crime is one of the major concerns of today's community pharmacy practitioner. I personally know that the property, and more importantly, personal safety of my friends and colleagues in the profession are in grave jeopardy. Greater than 99 percent of armed robberies of controlled substances were from pharmacies; 75 percent of crimes committed against drugstores were for the purpose of obtaining controlled substances, not cash. This problem is universal to all pharmacies, be they urban, suburban, or rural. A recent survey revealed that 50 percent of urban pharmacies reported the occurrence of a crime, whereas 45.3 percent of rural pharmacies also did.

One striking and very unfortunate consequence of these robberies is that as many as 40 percent of community pharmacies no longer stock some drugs that are the repeated targets for theft and violence. I think it is obvious to all of us that this fact has serious implications for drug therapy across our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, it is my feeling that a Federal role in this serious problem is both appropriate and necessary, and I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 5222.●

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to applaud the efforts of the Judiciary Committee and to express my support for H.R. 5222.

No Member is more aware of the illegal drug trade than those of us from the State of Florida. Illegal drug trafficking is big business in Florida. However, increasingly the documented cases of drug-related deaths can be attributed to the abuse of legitimate drugs, the majority of which were bought on the street from criminals who obtained these controlled substances by force.

With the enforcement of the Controlled Substances Act, prescription drugs have become more difficult to illegally obtain. Proportionately, their street value has risen, as has the incidence of robbery and burglary. Under present law, pharmacists are required to report the theft of controlled substances. Yet, Federal law does not protect these same pharmacists from the violence which is often visited upon them to obtain their drugs.

Mr. Speaker, I first introduced this type of legislation several years ago because of my concern with the safety of pharmacists. It has taken time, but the effort has brought fruition.

This is an important step in our drive to curtail pharmacy robberies. It will not end the problem, but it will make it easier to apprehend and convict those responsible. I am pleased that the House of Representatives is taking this step and hope we will soon be able to have this measure enacted into law.●

● Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 5222 and I request that my colleagues in the House vote in suppport of this vital measure. Last year, the Federal Drug Enforcement Administration provided me with some alarming statistics on thefts and losses of controlled substances in Virginia and nationwide. This data illustrates clearly the need for the Congress to address the problem of thefts and armed robbery of controlled substances.

Several of my colleagues on the Select Committee on Narcotics and Drug Abuse joined me in sponsoring H.R. 2929, legislation which is somewhat broader in scope than H.R. 5222. Our bill would amend the Controlled Substances Act to provide a penalty for employee thefts, customer pilferages, robberies, and burglaries of any controlled substance from any pharmacy practitioner, hospital, manufacturer, or distributor.

While I would prefer a more comprehensive measure, I recognize that existing Federal statutes are inadequate. H.R. 5222 is a giant step in the right direction and in my opinion, is a proper Federal response to a national problem which has reached crisis proportions.

A brief glimpse of the statistics will give you an idea of the extent of the problem we are facing. According to the DEA, in 1982 there were 2,861 thefts by night break-ins, 1,037 thefts by armed robbery, 876 employee thefts, 247 customer pilferages, and 833 incidents of loss in transit. Each one of these thefts or losses involves a large number of drugs. The average night breakin resulted in a loss of over 4,000 dosage units. This data reinforces the need for enactment of legislation.

I congratulate the committee chairman for holding hearings on this serious problem and presenting the House with a bill which addresses the problem in a responsible manner. I strongly urge the Members of the House to vote in support of H.R. 5222.●

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 5222.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks, and to include extraneous material therein, on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

(e)(1) As provided in paragraph (6) of section 4(d) of the Wilderness Act, nothing in this Act or in the Wilderness Act shall constitute an express or implied claim or denial on the part of the Federal Government as to exemption from Arizona State water laws.

(2) As provided in paragraph (7) of section 4(d) of the Wilderness Act, nothing in this Act or in the Wilderness Act shall be construed as affecting the jurisdiction or responsibilities of the State of Arizona with respect to wildlife and fish in the national forests located in that State.

(f)(1) Grazing of livestock in wilderness areas established by this Act, where established prior to the date of the enactment of this Act, shall be administered in accordance with section 4(d)(4) of the Wilderness Act and section 108 of Public Law 96-560.

(2) The Secretary is directed to review all policies, practices, and regulations of the Department of Agriculture regarding livestock grazing in national forest wilderness areas in Arizona in order to insure that such policies, practices, and regulations fully conform with and implement the intent of Congress regarding grazing in such areas, as such intent is expressed in this Act.

(3) Not later than one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, and at least every five years thereafter, the Secretary of Agriculture shall submit to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives and to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate a report detailing the progress made by the Forest Service in carrying out the provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this section.

SEC. 102. (a) In furtherance of the purposes of the Wilderness Act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall review the following as to their suitability or nonsuitability for preservation as wilderness and shall submit his recommendations to the President:

(1) certain lands in the Coronado National Forest, which comprise approximately seven hundred and forty acres as generally depicted on a map entitled "Bunk Robinson Wilderness Study Area Additions—Proposed", dated February 1984, and which are hereby incorporated in the Bunk Robinson Wilderness Study Area as designated by Public Law 96-550;

(2) certain lands in the Coronado National Forest which compromise approximately five thousand and eighty acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Whitmire Canyon Study Area Additions—Proposed", dated February 1984, and which are hereby incorporated in the Whitmire Canyon Wilderness Study Area as designated by Public Law 96-550;

(3) certain lands in the Coronado National Forest which comprise approximately sixty-five thousand acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Mount Graham Wilderness Study Area", dated March 21, 1984, and which shall be known as the Mount Graham Wilderness Study Area.

With respect to the areas named in paragraphs (1) and (2), the President shall submit his recommendations to the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate no later than January 1, 1986.

(b) Subject to valid existing rights, the wilderness study areas designated by this section shall, until Congress determines otherwise, be administered by the Secretary so as to maintain their presently existing wilderness character and potential for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System.

SEC. 103. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the Department of Agriculture has completed the second roadless area review and evaluation program (RARE II); and

(2) the Congress has made its own review and examination of national forest system roadless areas in the State of Arizona and of the environmental impacts associated with alternative allocations of such areas.

(b) On the basis of such review, the Congress hereby determines and directs that—

(1) without passing on the question of the legal and factual sufficiency of the RARE II final environmental statement (dated January 1979) with respect to national forest system lands in States other than Arizona such statement shall not be subject to judicial review with respect to national forest system lands in the State of Arizona;

(2) with respect to the national forest system lands in the State of Arizona which were reviewed by the Department of Agriculture in the second Roadless Area Review and Evaluation (RARE II), except those lands designated for wilderness study in section 2 of this Act or by previous Acts of Congress that review and evaluation shall be deemed for the purposes of the initial land management plans required for such lands by the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974 as amended by the National Forest Management Act of 1976 to be an adequate consideration of the suitability of such lands for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System and the Department of Agriculture shall not be required to review the wilderness option prior to the revision of the initial plans and in no case prior to the date established by law for completion of the initial planning cycle;

(3) areas in the State of Arizona reviewed in such final environmental statement and not designated as wilderness or wilderness study by Congress need not be managed for the purpose of protecting their suitability for wilderness designation pending revision of the initial plans; and

(4) unless expressly authorized by Congress, the Department of Agriculture shall not conduct any further statewide roadless area review and evaluation of national forest system lands in the State of Arizona for the purpose of determining their suitability for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System.

SEC. 104. Section 3(a) of the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act (16 U.S.C. 1274) is amended by inserting the following after paragraph (50):

"(51) VERDE, ARIZONA.—The segment from the boundary between national forest and private land in sections 26 and 27, township 13 north, range 5 east, Gila Salt River meridian, downstream to the confluence with Red Creek, as generally depicted on a map entitled 'Verde River—Wild and Scenic River', dated March 1984, which is on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Chief, Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture; to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture. This designation shall not prevent water users receiving Central Arizona Project water allocations from diverting that water through an exchange agreement with downstream water users in accordance with Arizona water law. After consultation with State and local governments and the interested public and within two years after the date of enactment of this paragraph, the Secretary shall take such action as is required under subsection (b) of this section.".

TITLE II

SEC. 201. The Congress finds that—

(1) the Aravaipa Canyon, situated in the Galiuro Mountains in the Sonoran desert region of southern Arizona, is a primitive place of great natural beauty that, due to the rare presence of a perennial stream, supports an extraordinary abundance and diversity of native plant, fish, and wildlife, making it a resource of national significance; and

(2) the Aravaipa Canyon should, together with certain adjoining public lands, be incorporated within the national wilderness preservation system in order to provide for the preservation and protection of this relatively undisturbed but fragile complex of desert, riparian and aquatic ecosystems, and the native plant, fish, and wildlife communities dependent on it, as well as to protect and preserve the area's great scenic, geologic, and historical values, to a greater degree than would be possible in the absence of wilderness designation.

SEC. 202. In furtherance of the purposes of the Wilderness Act of 1964 (78 Stat. 890, 16 U.S.C. 1131 et seq.) and consistent with the policies and provisions of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (90 Stat. 2743; 43 U.S.C. 1701 et seq.), certain public lands in Graham and Pinal Counties, Arizona, which comprise approximately six thousand six hundred and seventy acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Aravaipa Canyon Wilderness—Proposed" and dated May 1980, are hereby designated as the Aravaipa Canyon Wilderness and, therefore, as a component of the national wilderness preservation system.

SEC. 203. Subject to valid existing rights, the Aravaipa Canyon Wilderness shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior in accordance with the provisions of the Wilderness Act governing areas designated by that Act as wilderness. For purposes of this title, any references in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the effective date of this Act and any reference to the Secretary of Agriculture with regard to administration of such areas shall be deemed to be a reference to the Secretary of the Interior, and any reference to wilderness areas designated by the Wilderness Act or designated national forest wilderness areas shall be deemed to be a reference to the Aravaipa Canyon Wilderness. For purposes of this title, the reference to national forest rules and regulations in the second sentence of section 4(d)(3) of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to rules and regulations applicable to public lands, as defined in section 103(e) of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976 (43 U.S.C. 1701, 1702).

SEC. 204. As soon as practicable after this Act takes effect, the Secretary of the Interior shall file a map and a legal description of the Aravaipa Canyon Wilderness with the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and with the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the United States House of Representatives, and such map and description shall have the same force and effect as if included in this Act: Provided, That correction of clerical and typographical errors in the legal description and map may be made. The map and legal description shall be on file and available for public inspection in the offices of the Bureau of Land Management, Department of the Interior.

SEC. 205. Except as further provided in this section, the Aravaipa Primitive Area designations of January 16, 1969, and April 28, 1971, are hereby revoked.

TITLE III

SEC. 301. (a) In furtherance of the purposes of the Wilderness Act, the following lands are hereby designated as wilderness and therefore, as components of the National Wilderness Preservation System—

(1) certain lands in the Arizona Strip District of the Bureau of Land Management, Arizona, which comprise approximately six thousand five hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Cottonwood Point Wilderness—Proposed", dated May 1983, and which shall be known as the Cottonwood Point Wilderness;

(2) certain lands in the Arizona Strip District of the Bureau of Land Management, Arizona, which comprise approximately thirty-six thousand three hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Grand Wash Cliffs Wilderness—Proposed", dated May 1983, and which shall be known as the Grand Wash Cliffs Wilderness;

(3) certain lands in the Kaibab National Forest and in the Arizona Strip District of the Bureau of Land Management, Arizona, which comprise approximately seventy-seven thousand one hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Kanab Creek Wilderness—Proposed", dated May 1983, and which shall be known as the Kanab Creek Wilderness;

(4) certain lands in the Arizona Strip District of the Bureau of Land Management, Arizona, which comprise approximately fourteen thousand six hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Mt. Logan Wilderness—Proposed", dated May 1983, and which shall be known as the Mount Logan Wilderness;

(5) certain lands in the Arizona Strip District of the Bureau of Land Management, Arizona, which comprise approximately seven thousand nine hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Mt. Trumbull Wilderness—Proposed", dated May 1983, and which shall be known as the Mount Trumbull Wilderness;

(6) certain lands in the Arizona Strip District of the Bureau of Land Management, Arizona, which comprise approximately eighty-four thousand seven hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Paiute Wilderness—Proposed", dated May 1983, and which shall be known as the Paiute Wilderness;

(7) certain lands in the Arizona Strip District, Arizona, and in the Cedar City District, Utah, of the Bureau of Land Management, which comprise approximately one hundred and ten thousand acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Paria Canyon-Vermilion Cliffs Wilderness—Proposed", dated May 1983, and which shall be known as the Paria Canyon-Vermilion Cliffs Wilderness;

(8) certain lands in the Kaibab National Forest, Arizona, which comprise approximately thirty-eight thousand two hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Saddle Mountain Wilderness—Proposed", dated May 1983, and which shall be known as the Saddle Mountain Wilderness; and

(9) certain lands in the Arizona Strip District, Arizona, and in the Cedar City District, Utah, of the Bureau of Land Management, which comprise approximately nineteen thousand six hundred acres, as generally depicted on a map entitled "Beaver Dam Mountains Wilderness—Proposed", dated May 1983, and which shall be known as the Beaver Dam Mountains Wilderness.

(b) The previous classifications of the Paiute Primitive Area and the Paria Canyon Primitive Area are hereby abolished.

SEC. 302. (a) Subject to valid existing rights, each wilderness area designated by this title shall be administered by the Secretary concerned in accordance with the provisions of the Wilderness Act: Provided, That any reference in such provisions to the effective date of the Wilderness Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the effective date of this Act, and any reference to the Secretary of Agriculture shall be deemed to be a reference to the Secretary who has administrative jurisdiction over the area.

(b) Within the wilderness areas designated by this title, the grazing of livestock, where established prior to the date of enactment of this Act, shall be permitted to continue subject to such reasonable regulations, policies, and practices as the Secretary concerned deems necessary, as long as such regulations, policies, and practices fully conform with and implement the intent of Congress regarding grazing in such areas as such intent is expressed in the Wilderness Act and this title.

SEC. 303. As soon as practicable after enactment of this Act, a map and a legal description on each wilderness area designated by this title shall be filed by the Secretary concerned with the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the United States Senate and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, and each such map and description shall have the same force and effect as if included in this Act: Provided, That correction of clerical and typographical errors in each such legal description and map may be made by the Secretary concerned subsequent to such filings. Each such map and legal description shall be on file and available for public inspection in the Office of the Chief of the Forest Service, Department of Agriculture or in the Office of the Director of the Bureau of Land Management, Department of the Interior, as is appropriate.

SEC. 304. (a) The Congress hereby finds and directs that lands in the Arizona Strip District of the Bureau of Land Management, Arizona, and those portions of the Starvation Point Wilderness Study Area (UT-040-057) and Paria Canyon Instant Study Area and contiguous Utah units in the Cedar City District of the Bureau of Land Management, Utah, not designated as wilderness by this Act have been adequately studied for wilderness designation pursuant to section 603 of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act (Public Law 94-579), and are no longer subject to the requirement of section 603(c) of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act pertaining to management in a manner that does not impair suitability for preservation as wilderness.

(b) The Congress hereby determines and directs that—

(1) certain lands in the Kaibab National Forest known as the Red Point (03063), Big Ridge (03064), Burro Canyon (03065) and Willis Canyon (03066) roadless areas, as identified in executive communication numbered 1504, Ninety-sixth Congress (House Document numbered 96-119), and the portion of the Kanab Creek RARE II roadless area (B3-060) not designated wilderness by this Act have been adequately studied for Wilderness in the RARE II Final Environmental Statement (dated January 1979);

(2) such studies shall constitute an adequate consideration of the suitability of such lands for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System and the Department of Agriculture shall not be required to review the wilderness option for such areas prior to revision of the initial plans required for such lands by the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974 as amended by the National Forest Management Act of 1976 and in no case prior to the date established by law for completion of the initial planning cycle; and

(3) such areas need not be managed for the purpose of protecting their suitability for wilderness designation pending revision of the initial plans.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McCAIN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY).

Mr. NcNULTY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the Arizona Wilderness bill, perhaps appropriately should be called the first Arizona Wilderness bill, would place in wilderness designation 1.2 million acres of ground and would include some of the most gorgeous scenery in the State of Arizona.

What is probably, from a political standpoint, most important about it is the degree of contribution made by the many user interests. This bill has been under study and under criticism and under construction for a period of something more than 6 months now. There have been extensive reviews made by the mining interests for example, and by the timbering interests.

In my case, I have certainly had a substantial opportunity to meet with the members of the Arizona Cattle Growers Association; people representing wilderness interests and environmental interest have had a chance to participate. Out of that I think has come a bill which represents, to the highest degree possible, a fairly decent consensus.

If politics is as I believe it to be the art of compromise and the science of the achievable, then I think H.R. 4707 richly deserves your consideration and your approbation.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. RUDD).

Mr. RUDD. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 4707, the Arizona Wilderness Act. This measure proposes to deny Arizonans and the people of our country the use of an additional 722,300 acres of their land by adding it to the existing designated wilderness in the State.

Wilderness designation by the Federal Government removes valuable land from multiple use where it would be available under Government management for recreation, wildlife habitat, timber production, grazing, mineral exploration, and commercial development for the benefit of all Arizonans.

Our Founding Fathers fought a revolution against those who sought to control public lands for their own narrow purposes. I therefore do not believe the majority should be denied the right to benefit from their lands through restrictive wilderness designations which will benefit only a few.

I have long advocated multiple-use management as the best alternative to accommodate the many needs of our citizens, whether they be development and respectful use of the natural resources within the lands, recreation or wilderness preservation. Those who work and depend upon the land—miners, cattlemen, timbermen, and others—not only have the greatest incentive to protect it—it is their livelihood—but they also generate billions of dollars worth of direct and indirect social and economic benefits for their fellow citizens in Arizona and in America.

My constituents in Arizona have consistently, and in overwhelming numbers, opposed additional wilderness designations. Eighty-six percent of those who have written me on the wilderness issue have expressed opposition to more wilderness.

Despite this strong concern, however, most everyone agrees that the roadless area review and evaluation process (RARE) will go on forever unless we take action. Arizonans have therefore been working together to reach an acceptable compromise to put an end to the long drawn out RARE process once and for all.

Because of these good faith efforts, I was particularly concerned to learn that various-user groups, which will have to live with the consequences of wilderness designations, had not received up-to-date maps of the proposed wilderness area until the day before the Interior Committee markup on March 21 and the several days following the committee's action. I was advised by representatives of the Southwestern Minerals Exploration Association and the Arizona Mining & Prospecting Association that they had not received maps until even last week. Certainly any effort to reach a reasonable compromise demand that those affected be allowed sufficient time to thoroughly review and comment on the specific areas targeted under this bill. I do not believe they have had that opportunity.

In all, H.R. 4707 designates an unacceptable 722,300 acres of Arizona land as wilderness. It designates approximately 215,000 acres on the Tonto National Forest in my district as wilderness, about 30 percent of the total wilderness designated in the bill.

Of those areas in my district, most are prime grazing areas or lands with important mineral or energy potential.

For example, in the Four Peaks area, mining claims are numerous; amethyst, tungsten, beryllium, and lithium have been found. Four Peaks is prime cattle country. The area is also suitable for watershed management that would increase the water yield into the Salt River. Furthermore, numerous existing jeep roads, holding pasture, pipeline, and fencing make the area's suitability for wilderness questionable.

Salome has been identified as having potential for fluorspar, barite, uranium, and precious metals. It is prime grazing area for livestock. Range improvements, including water storage tanks, pipelines, and fences are planned by the current permittee to improve the area for grazing and wildlife, and to eliminate overgrazing.

Hellsgate is underlain by tin-bearing formations; associated with anomalous tin are tantalum, yttrium, and beryllium. There are existing trails and roads and brush clearing and burning projects.

The Salt area has potential for both chrysolite and uranium. Again, this is prime grazing land and range improvements are necessary for the permittee's operations. There has also been vegetation manipulation and brush burning.

Of the areas proposed for designation as wilderness outside my district, I have received comments in opposition to inclusion of Mount Wrightson on the Coronado National Forest, Castle Creek, Arnold Mesa, Sheridan Mountain, and Woodchute on the Prescott National Forest, and Bear Wallow to the Apache-Sitgreaves National Forest.

All these areas, rich in natural resources, should not be locked away into restrictive wilderness designations. Instead, they should be opened to multiple use for the benefit of the majority of Arizonans.

Beside the areas proposed for wilderness, I strongly oppose this bill's release language. The bill provides that the Department of Agriculture "shall not be required to review the wilderness option prior to the review of the initial plans and in no case prior to the date established by law for completion of the initial planning cycle." It does not specify a certain date before which the Department would be precluded from reviewing the wilderness option.

For myself, I would prefer that those lands not designated as wilderness be released to multiple use once and for all, and not be subject to any further review by the Forest Service.

However, user groups and others in Arizona have asked only that language be included in the bill designating a specific date, January 1, 1998, before which the Forest Service would be precluded from reviewing the land for wilderness potential. This is only reasonable. Those who must rely upon the lands for their livelihood must have some certainty about the status of their land for long-range planning and credit purposes.

Furthermore, specific language ought to be included in the bill to insure motorized access to ranchers for range maintenance and improvements. Ranchers are not out to destroy the land, but to protect it. They have already protected the land so well in fact, that many of these areas are still considered suitable for wilderness.

I also object to the provisions of titles II and III being included in this legislation. These provisions are identical to those of H.R. 2724, the Aravaipa Canyon Wilderness bill, and H.R. 3562, the Arizona Strip Wilderness bill, respectively, H.R. 3562, in particular, came about as a result of long and careful negotiations and compromise between user groups and environmentalists in Arizona. These two bills are noncontroversial and ought to be considered on their own merit. The efforts of those who developed the legislation should not be ignored by placing its provisions in this still-controversial wilderness bill, H.R. 4707.

Finally, I oppose the wild and scenic river designation of the Verde River. While efforts have been made to accommodate the proposed construction of Cliff Dam, there are still serious questions about flood control and water management on account of the designation.

The people of Arizona will have to live with the consequences of this body's decision with regard to this legislation. I strongly oppose H.R. 4707 on behalf of the vast majority of my constituents, and I urge my colleagues to oppose it as well.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 4707, the Arizona Wilderness Act of 1984. This is the 11th wilderness bill, and the 8th wilderness package to be considered by the House during the 98th Congress, and it is especially pleasing to me to note the progress we are making in finally putting the RARE II/wilderness issue to rest in most States. It is to be hoped that by the time this Congress ends we will have settled the national forest wilderness issue in most instances.

I will not take the time to discuss the specific wilderness proposals and attributes of H.R. 4707. Chairman UDALL can do that far better than I could on this bill. However, I note that the bill contains many wilderness proposals that, by virtue of careful negotiation and compromise on the part of the major interest groups involved, have been crafted to eliminate resource conflicts or other potential problems. As such, the bill appears to enjoy a broad degree of support, which attests to the tremendous effort Chairman UDALL has made to consult all affected parties and interest groups.

I would also like to address one other issue, the issue of so-called release language, because I believe H.R. 4707 may help resolve a partial impasse which appears to be stalling consideration of wilderness bills in the other body. As many Members are aware, our State wilderness packages contain not only wilderness designations, but they also address the question of how undeveloped lands not designated as wilderness may be managed by the Forest Service. We have provided, in all national forest wilderness bills passed since the completion of RARE II in 1979, that lands not designated as wilderness or wilderness study may be managed for such uses as the Forest Service determines appropriate in its land management planning process. In short, we have restated Congress 1976 decision that national forest lands will be managed pursuant to the 1976 National Forest Management Act. Our so-called release language formula, which was negotiated with representatives of the Forest Service, the National Forest Products Association and several major environmental groups in 1980, provides that nonwilderness lands can be developed, if the Forest Service determines, as part of its statutory planning process, that development is appropriate. It also reaffirms NFMA's provisions that wilderness values will not have to be restudied on eligible lands until national forest management plans are completely revised some 10 to 15 years from now.

Despite what I believe is clear statutory language in this regard, the Forest Service and others have raised questions concerning possible interpretation of some of the provisions of our standard release formula. I have reviewed their concerns, and have seen nothing that I think necessitates changes in the statutory language. Indeed, most of the comments appear to involve technical or other issues which we specifically discussed and addressed with committee report language in 1980. Nevertheless, there are several points which were raised which probably can benefit by citing additional examples of Congress intentions, and by further illustrating how the release formula ties in with the National Forest Management Act planning process.

Thus, after discussions with the Forest Service and numerous individuals and interest groups, we have worked with our Republican colleagues to draft additional committee report language. Since its circulation last week, I have been told by the Chief of the Forest Service and several Members of Congress that it is very helpful language, which addresses major areas of concern, I am therefore hopeful that this language will help break the release logjam which has developed in the Senate, and I would ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

I am aware that there are those who would like some of this language to be included in the statute, but I believe that after reviewing it most Members will agree with my assessment that the types of hypotheticals and examples used in the report language do not lend themselves to statutory promulgation. Further, although I have spent countless hours over the past 4 years attempting to determine whether it might be possible to legislate the committee report language, I have thus far been unable to see any need or justification for additional statutory language which would amend or otherwise impinge on the provisions of the National Forest Management Act. I am, therefore, hopeful that when those concerned with our standard release formula have a full opportunity to examine the formula, as further clarified by the committee report language of H.R. 4707, they will conclude that we have gone as far as we can to allay their concerns without amending the National Forest Management Act.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I believe H.R. 4707 is exceptionally meritorious legislation, which may help break the release impasse. I urge my colleagues to support it and I commend Chairman UDALL and the other Members of the Arizona delegation who have done such an outstanding job of producing this consensus bill.

RELEASE/SUFFICIENCY

Section 103 of H.R. 4707 contains the "release/sufficiency" language which has been incorporated by the Congress in seven State wilderness bills enacted over the past several years. This language statutorily confirms the April 1979 administrative "release" of certain RARE II nonwilderness recommended lands and releases other lands not designated as wilderness or wilderness study by H.R. 4707.

The language continues to trouble a number of affected industry groups, and in an effort to address their concerns, the Committee wishes to further clarify the purpose and intent of the provisions of this section and elaborate on certain issues not specifically discussed in previous bills.

The question of "release" (i.e., making lands available for non-wilderness management and possible development) arises from the interest in the future management of areas reviewed during the RARE II process. The controversy focuses on the point at which those lands not designated as wilderness or wilderness study by this Act, but reviewed in the RARE II process, can again be considered for possible recommendation to the Congress for designation as wilderness, and on the question of how these lands will be managed.

The "sufficiency" aspect of this question arose subsequently because of a decision in Federal District Court in California. Soon after the completion of RARE II, the State of California brought suit against the Secretary of Agriculture challenging the legal and factual sufficiency of the RARE II Final Environmental Impact Statement insofar as its consideration of wilderness in some 46 areas in the State of California was concerned.

In January 1980 Judge Lawrence Karlton of the United States Distrrict Court for the Eastern District of California, in State of California v. Bergland, 483 F. Supp. 465 (1980), held that the RARE II Final Environmental Statement had insuficiently considered the wilderness alternative for the specific areas challenged. Judge Karlton enjoined any development which would "change the wilderness character" of these areas until subsequent consideration of the wilderness values in accordance with the National Environmental Policy Act is completed by the Department of Agriculture. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed in District Court opinion in California v. Block (690 F. 2d 653) in 1982.

While the decision applied specifically only to the 46 roadless areas in California for which the plaintiffs sought relief, the overall conclusions in the case are binding in states such as Arizona that are located in the Ninth Circuit. The net effect is that development activities on roadless areas in such states may be held up if appealed in administrative or judicial forums. This has, in fact, already happened in several instances, and has thrown a cloud of uncertainty over the development of some roadless areas, whereas development has occurred in others.

The Wilderness Act of 1964 provides that only Congress can designate land for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System. Since the Committee has, in the course of developing this bill, very carefully reviewed the roadless areas in Arizona for possible inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System, the Committee believes that judicial review of the RARE II Final Environmental Statement insofar as national forest system lands in Arizona are concerned is unnecessary. Therefore, the bill provides that the Final Environmental Statement is not subject to judicial review with respect to national forest system lands in Arizona.

The Committee does wish to reemphasize that the sufficiency language in this Act only holds the RARE II EIS to be legally sufficient for the roadless areas in the State of Arizona and only on the basis of the full review undertaken by the Congress. Similar language will be necessary to resolve the issue in the other states.

MANAGEMENT AND FUTURE WILDERNESS CONSIDERATION OF ROADLESS AREAS NOT DESIGNATED AS WILDERNESS OR WILDERNESS STUDY

The RARE II process during 1977-1979 took place concurrently with the development by the Forest Service of a new land management planning process mandated by the National Forest Management Act of 1976. That process requires that the forest land management plans be reviewed and revised periodically to provide for a variety of uses. During the review and revision process the Forest Service is required to study a broad range of potential uses and options. In conjunction with the National Environmental Policy Act, NFMA provides that the option of recommending land to Congress for inclusion in National Wilderness Preservation System is one of the many options which must be considered during the planning process for those lands which may be suited for wilderness. The Forest Service is presently developing the initial, or "first generation", plan for each national forest. These are the so-called "section 6" plans, and they are targeted for completion by September 30, 1985. For the six national forests in Arizona some plans may not actually be completed and implemented until 1986 or later due to administrative problems including delay resulting from the cloud of the California lawsuit and the debate taking place as a result of pending legislation.

One of the goals of RARE II was to consider the wilderness potential of national forest roadless areas. The Committee believes that further consideration of wilderness during development of the initial plans for the national forest system roadless areas in Arizona not designated as wilderness or wilderness study upon enactment of H.R. 4707 would be duplicative of the study and review which has recently taken place by both the Forest Service and the Congress. Therefore, the release language of H.R. 4707, and previous bills, provides that wilderness values need not be reviewed again during development of the "first generation plans."

Beyond the initial plans lies the issue of when the wilderness option for roadless areas should again be considered. As noted, the initial plans are targeted for completion by September 30, 1985. The National Forest Management Act provides that a plan shall be in effect for no longer than 15 years before it is revised. The Forest Service regulations, however provide that a forest plan "shall ordinarily be revised on a 10-year cycle or at least every 15 years." (36 CFR § 219.10(g).)

The bill, as reported, provides that the Department of Agriculture shall not be required to review the wilderness option until it revises the initial plans. By using the word "revision" the Committee intends to make it clear, consistent with NFMA and the Forest Service regulations, that amendments or even amendments which might "result in a significant change" in a plan, would not trigger the need for reconsideration of the wilderness option. The wilderness option does not need to be reconsidered until the Forest Service determines, based on a review of the lands covered by a plan, that conditions or demands in the area covered by a plan have changed so significantly that the entire plan needs to be completely revised.

A revision of a forest plan will be a costly undertaking in terms of dollars and manpower and the Committee does not expect such an effort to be undertaken lightly. Every effort will be made to address local changes through the amendment process leaving the revision option only for major, forest wide changes in conditions or demands.

For example, if a new powerline were proposed to be built across a forest, this would be accomplished by an amendment, not a revision, and therefore the wilderness option would not have to be reexamined. Likewise, the construction of new range improvements or adjustments in livestock allotments for permittees would not constitute a "revision". It is only when a proposed change in management would significantly affect overall goals or uses for the entire forest concern, that a "revision" would occur. For example, the recent eruption of Mt. St. Helens, because it affected so much of the land on the entire Gifford Pinchot National Forest, including the forest's overall timber harvest scenario, would likely have forced a "revision" of the plan. Likewise, decisions to significantly increase timber harvest levels on an entire forest or to change a multiplicity of uses in order to accommodate dramatically increased recreation demands might force a "revision". In this regard, the Committee wishes to note, however, that in the vast majority of cases the 10-15 year planning cycle established by NFMA and the existing regulations is short enough to accommodate most changes. Conditions are highly unlikely to change so dramatically prior to 10-15 years that more frequent "revisions" would be required. For example, it would be hard to envision a scenario under which demands for primitive, semi-primitive or motorized recreation would increase so rapidly over an entire National Forest that the Forest Service would feel obliged to revise a plan prior to the normal 10-15 life span. Recreation demands might increase in a specific area or areas, but such demands could be met by amending the plan, as opposed to revising it.

Forest Service Chief Max Peterson has indicated that, in his view, most plans will be in existence for approximately ten years before they are revised. The Committee shares this view and anticipates that the vast majority of plans will not be revised significantly in advance of their anticipated maximum life span absent extraordinary circumstances. The Committee understands and expects that with first generation plans to be in effect by late 1985, or slightly later, the time of revision for most plans will be around 1995. In almost every case, the Committee, therefore, expects that the consideration of wilderness for these roadless areas will not be reexamined until approximately 1995. The Committee notes that administrative or judicial appeals may mean that many first generation plans are not actually implemented until the late 1980's, in which case plan revisions would be unlikely to occur until around the year 2000, or beyond. Or, if the full 15 years allowed by NFMA runs before a revision is undertaken, the wilderness option may mot in some cases be reviewed until the year 2000 or later.

The question has also arisen as to whether a "revision" would be triggered if the Forest Service is forced by the courts to modify or rework an initial plan, or if the Forest Service withdrew an initial plan to correct technical errors or to address issues raised by an administrative appeal. The Committee wishes to state in the most emphatic terms possible, that any reworking of an initial plan for such reasons would obviously not constitute a "revision" of the plan that would reopen the wilderness question. Rather, any such reworking would constitute proper implementation of the plan. The logic for the Committee's reasoning in this regard is that any such court ordered or administrative reworkings or modifications of a plan would come about to resolve questions related to the preparation and implementation of the plan in accordance with the requirements of NFMA and other applicable law. So such reworking or modification would not be a "revision" (which pursuant to NFMA and the implementing regulations is to be based on changed conditions or demands on the land), because a plan must be properly prepared and implemented before it can be "revised".

The fact that the wilderness option for roadless areas will be considered in the future during the planning process raises the hypothetical argument that the areas must be managed to preserve their wilderness attributes so these may be considered in the future. Such an interpretation would result in all roadless areas being kept in de facto wilderness for a succession of future planning processes. Such a requirement would completely frustrate the orderly management of non-wilderness lands and the goals of the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act.

To eliminate any possible misunderstanding on this point, the bill provides that areas not designated as wilderness or wilderness study need not be managed for the purpose of protecting their suitability for further wilderness review pending revision of the initial plans. The Committee believes the Forest Service already has statutory authority to manage roadless areas for multiple use, nonwilderness purposes. It wishes to make clear, however, that study of the wilderness option in future generations of Section 6 plans is required only for those lands which may be suited for wilderness at the time of the implementation of the future plans. Between the planning cycles, the uses authorized in the plan in effect can proceed until a new plan is implemented. In short, one plan will remain in effect until the second plan is implemented. There is no bar to management which may, as a practical matter, result in the land no longer being suited for wilderness. Thus it is likely that many areas studied for wilderness in one generation of plans may not physically qualify for wilderness consideration by the time the next generation of plans is prepared. As an example of this, the Committee notes that many areas studied for wilderness in RARE II and recommended for non-wilderness have already been developed since their administrative "release" in April of 1979.

Therefore, under this language, the Forest Service may conduct a timber sale in a roadless area and not be challenged on the basis that the area must be considered for wilderness in a future planning cycle. Once into a second-generation plan, the Forest Service may, of course, manage a roadless area according to that plan without the necessity of preserving the wilderness option for the third-generation planning process. Should the particular area still be suited for possible wilderness at the time of the third-generation planning process, the wilderness option would be considered at that time. In short, the wilderness option must be considered in each future planning generation if the particular land in question still possess wilderness attributes. But there is no requirement that these attributes be preserved solely for the purpose of their future evaluation in the planning process.

In short, this language means that the Forest Service cannot be forced by any individual or group through a lawsuit, administrative appeal, or otherwise to manage lands in a "de facto" wilderness manner. Of course, the Forest Service can, if it determines it appropriate, manage lands in an undeveloped manner, just as it can, if through the Land Management Planning process it determies it appropriate, develop released lands. The emphasis here is that the Forest Service will be able to manage released lands in the manner determined appropriate through the land management planning process.

The Committee has reached this position after careful thought and a balancing of all the wishes and concerns of the groups involved, and wishes to emphasize the vital importance of getting the forest plans in place in Arizona and ending the state of limbo which now exists.

NO FURTHER STATEWIDE REVIEW

The final issue addressed by the Committee in Section 103 of H.R. 4707 pertains to the possibility of future administrative reviews similar to RARE I and RARE II. With the National Forest Management Act planning process now in place, the Committee wishes to see the development of any future wilderness recommendations by the Forest Service take place only through that planning process, unless Congress expressly asks for other additional evaluations. Therefore, the legislation directs the Department of Agriculture not to conduct any further statewide roadless area review and evaluation of national forest system lands in Arizona for the purpose of determining their suitability for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System.

The Committee recognizes that this directive might technically be evaded by conducting such a study on some basis slightly smaller than statewide. The Committee is confident, however, that the Department recognizes the spirit as well as the letter of this language and that the Committee can expect there will be no "RARE III".

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. DE LA GARZA), the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would like briefly to discuss a matter of jurisdictional interest to the Committee on Agriculture relating to H.R. 4707.

This bill has been referred jointly to the Committee on Agriculture and the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. The bill contains so-called release-sufficiency language which relates to the management of areas in the national forests with which the bill is concerned which are not designated as wilderness. In order to expedite consideration of this bill, I do not object to its being taken up on the floor of the House without consideration by the Committee on Agriculture. I take this position without in any respect waiving jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture with regard to the release-sufficiency issues as addressed in this bill or in similar bills. If the provisions of H.R. 4707 relating to matters within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Agriculture should become an issue with the Senate—in the event that the bill passes the House—I intend to request that the Committee on Agriculture be represented in any conference which may be held.

I appreciate this opportunity to make clear the jurisdictional interest of my committee in the release-sufficiency issues that are present in this bill and in most bills designating wilderness areas in the national forests.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE LA GARZA. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his cooperative attitude and assure him that the statements he just made will be carried out by us with regard to the conference or other changes.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. STUMP).

Mr. STUMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, last July, I signed a letter, with my colleagues in the Arizona delegation, soliciting the advice and recommendations of interested parties in Arizona regarding the multiple use and wilderness designations for Forest Service lands in our State. We sent that letter because the uncertainty of future public land use needs to be resolved.

Significant progress has been made toward reaching a decision, but I believe we have more work to do.

While I do not generally support wilderness, the necessity for a RARE II reevaluation affords us both the opportunity and challenge to resolve the multiple use/wilderness issues facing our State. The decisions should be made now so that the uncertainty of land use designations is removed and those who use the forests are able to plan for their future. More importantly, the decisions must be made by Arizonans—especially those who will be directly affected by such designations.

The purpose of our efforts should be the determination of which of our forest lands in Arizona truly reflect the intent of the 1964 Wilderness Act. Wilderness is defined in that act as an area of Federal land that "generally appears to have been affected primarily by the forces of nature." Our determinations must not be preconceived in terms of numbers of acres. Nor should we lose sight of our responsibility in realistically assessing when public benefits from additional wilderness preservation no longer exceed the public losses from other resources remaining unused. The discussions necessary to make such an important determination cannot be rushed if we are to make reasonable assessments and decisions.

Within the bill we are considering today, 57 percent of the acres to be designated as wilderness are located in Arizona's Third District. From the comments I continue to receive, there is no doubt in my mind that there is still a need for compromise among concerns such as the ranchers, miners, and environmental interests. Not only are some of the areas included in the bill too encompassing, and indeed some not worthy of designation, but I feel that we have failed to address some of the concerns of traditional public land users—most specifically in the areas of release and grazing language.

In addition, I cannot support the bill's inclusion of the provision of the Arizona Strip Wilderness Act. The introduction of that bill, as a separate piece of legislation, represents many long months of intense negotiation and the result is a proposal which enjoys unanimous support. The appeal and success of the strip bill is that it is a product of those who have a direct interest and use of the land in the strip, rather than a congressional mandate. The diversity of interests among ranchers, miners, timber companies, environmentalists, local governments, and Federal agencies normally would not lend itself to successfully dealing with the wilderness question. Yet in this case, those same diverse interests proved that with the give and take on the part of all parties involved, a strong consensus resolving the question can be reached. The result of the actions on the strip will be a plan with which everyone can live, strongly facilitating the implementation of land use management.

At the same time the strip bill was being negotiated, it was done so as an issue in and of itself, not as a part of a larger package. The provisions of the strip bill can and should stand alone, and their inclusion in this bill jeopardizes its support and acceptance.

Mr. Speaker, I must also oppose the provisions in the bill regarding release language and grazing provisions. Rather than the "soft" release language included in the bill, I believe that adoption of language which would provide that lands not designated as wilderness shall not be managed for the purpose of protecting their suitability for wilderness designation pending revision of initial Forest Services plans, and in no event prior to January 1, 2000, would be a clearer reflection of the concerns in our State. Adoption of that language would clearly state our intent to resolve the wilderness/multiple use question so that responsible land use planning and activities could proceed, yet at the same time remove any doubt as to the direction for Forest Service land management. That language does not require development, but significantly reduces the planning of Forest Service lands for wilderness through the management plan process.

While there appears to be widespread agreement with regard to the continuation of grazing within designated wilderness areas, I do not believe that agreement is adequately reflected in the provisions of the bill itself. The normal management problems between the Forest Service and the cattle industry will no doubt continue, but I do not believe that we should add to those problems by failing to adequately address the grazing issue in this bill. I am concerned that we have once again clouded the grazing issue through the incorporation, by reference, of guidelines and policies. We are encouraging widespread interpretation of those guidelines, leading to further problems, especially in the area of mechanized equipment. I am also concerned that because we are incorporating guidelines rather than substantive requirements, a court may emphasize the lack of amendment to the Wilderness Act, and view the incorporation of the guidelines hostilely as a new twist on retroactive legislative history, and give it little effect. For that reason, I believe that language should have been included in this bill which not only provides for livestock grazing, but also the use of mechanized equipment.

The amount of land in our State in existing or potential wilderness is substantial, in addition to the more than 3 million acres in the State preserved for national parks and wildlife refuges. As one of the fastest growing States, we cannot afford to disregard the adverse potential of putting unreasonable amounts or unsuited lands in wilderness. We can ill afford to mortgage our future, ignoring the needs of current public land users, as well as the general public which owns the land and benefits from its resources. Better management of our existing resources and an improved realization of existing public land uses as well as the State's vast untapped resource potentials are essential to reasonably provide for our continued growth.

I applaud the efforts which have been made so far by those Arizonans who realize the necessity for our resolving the question of multiple-use/wilderness in our State, and who have assumed the responsibility for reaching a consensus. Employing the same sense of give and take as was done in developing the Arizona strip bill and taking the time to insure that we have addressed all concerns, I hope that we could have a similar success in resolving this issue. However, I believe that there is ample evidence to show that we still have more work to be done before an agreement is reached which truly reflects the needs and interests of those parties which have a direct interest in our public lands. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I must oppose this legislation.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 4707, the Arizona wilderness bill.

Title I of the bill would designate 29 new Forest Service wilderness areas totaling some 722,300 acres. Titles II and III are the so-called Aravaipa Canyon and Arizona strip wilderness proposals. The strip bill would designate 9 new Forest Service and BLM wilderness areas totaling 394,900 acres. The Aravaipa Canyon is a BLM instant wilderness proposal encompassing 6,670 acres. In other words, we have an omnibus bill for Arizona before us designating approximately 1.1 million acres of wilderness and releasing or returning to multiple use almost 2 million acres of Forest Service and BLM land.

While none of the proposed wilderness areas are in my congressional district—as I represent portion of the Phoenix metropolitan area—I am deeply concerned about the wilderness issue and I am pleased to have played a role in developing this legislation.

My distinguished predecessor who represented this district for 30 years in this House, former Congressman John Rhodes, supports this bill, and I note that the administration has no objection to the bill.

My constituents will use and benefit from the nearby wilderness areas, particularly the Four Peaks and Superstition additions. Many of my constituents are also concerned about the creation of too much wilderness and will benefit from the release of the remaining lands.

I have learned during the debate on this bill that there are many tradeoffs involved in wilderness designations. There are many uses of the land which are compatible, such as grazing and recreation, and there are others which will not be allowed. In every case, there are economic concerns and even national security issues such as in the case of strategic or critical minerals.

The pressures brought to bear on the members of the Arizona delegation have been tremendous and I personally have spent hundreds of hours visiting the proposed areas and meeting with the interested groups.

While I believe there are additional modifications which may need to be made such as Congressman STUMP and Congressman RUDD will point out and have pointed out; I believe Chairman UDALL has done an excellent job of bringing the various groups together and minimizing the conflicts.

For example, the Salt River project, a major flood control project serving Phoenix, worked out with the committee language to allow them to maintain, relocate, or install new flood control gages using motorized access when necessary. Without this authority, the Salt River project would be severely hampered in its efforts to monitor water levels in the streams and rivers above Phoenix.

Chairman SEIBERLING expressed concern that this type of language might set a precedent or in some way impede similar activities on already existing wilderness areas. I am pleased to say that a consensus was worked out which best suits the needs of the Salt River project and Arizona. As a result, the Salt River project now supports the legislation.

Two other major concerns have been the Arizona Mining Association and the Arizona Cattlegrowers. The chairman has made numerous boundary modifications and excluded a number of areas of importance to these groups. A few troublesome areas still remain in the bill but I am confident that these will also be worked out.

Aside from actual areas and boundaries, two major issues also trouble these groups—the release provisions and the grazing language. I understand Chairman SEIBERLING intends to enter in the RECORD the report language which he just did, which he and I worked out. I believe this would be helpful. We spent considerable effort attempting to clarify the release provisions and addressed a number of issues which have come up since its enactment in other bills.

Of particular concern is the duration of the first generation of forest management plans. In other words, when can the wilderness question be reopened? We discuss this in some detail in the report language and go to considerable effort to point out that it is our intention that these plans last 10 years or more. Suggestions have been made that we actually legislate a date certain or a 10-year planning cycle for wilderness, and I believe these suggestions deserve consideration.

On the grazing issue, the concern we heard the most often was the possible arbitrary enforcement of the so-called guidelines or regulations worked out by our committee and the Forest Service. Our report language includes the guidelines in full and the bill requires a report to Congress on the progress being made in carrying out the guidelines.

Overall, I believe the legislation is balanced. Its passage will lift the cloud imposed on all Forest Service activities by the California lawsuit and will allow us to get on with the enjoyment and proper management of these lands.

I urge my colleagues to support the bill.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 4707.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, today I am very proud and happy to bring before the House, H.R. 4707, the Arizona Wilderness Act. As chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs I have brought many wilderness bills to this floor, but never before have I had the opportunity to present such a far-reaching piece of wilderness legislation for my own State of Arizona. All my life I have loved the land with which we as Americans have been uniquely blessed. All my career I have worked to preserve and protect the best of it. Now, I ask my colleagues in the House for their help in preserving and protecting some of the land for which I have a special feeling—the land of Arizona.

Mr. Speaker, as has been pointed out here, this represents a lot of work and a lot of compromise. The three of us from Arizona, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCNULTY), the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. MCCAIN), and myself all serve on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and have had the heavy responsibility of trying to put together this compromise.

As has been noted, the administration has no objection. I took great pride in the fact that Senator GOLDWATER, our senior Senator, introduced the RARE II portion of the bill exactly as I had introduced it on the House side.

I know that many people think of Arizona as all desert and cactus and we do have a lot of extraordinary desert and cactus. But the environment of my State is exceptionally diverse and surprising. This bill I bring before you today would protect more than 1 million acres of this rich and unusual land from the Utah border to the international border. Another 2 million acres would be released to multiple-use management.

Arizona is towering mountains of great magnificence, many of them known as Arizona "Sky Islands." The famed San Franciso Peaks near Flagstaff are the site of the highest peak in Arizona. They are sacred to the Navaho and Hopi peoples who believe that the kachinas come from there. They are also considered by many to be the birthplace of the modern science of ecology. Granite Mountain near Prescott is the dominant feature of the area and from its top there are sweeping views of the surrounding valley. Four Peaks can be seen from Phoenix 40 miles away and its rugged topography falling rapidly off steep cliffs into the Salt River provides some of the most uncommon recreation opportunities in Arizona. Mount Graham is the highest point in all of southern Arizona and the source of a wealth of wildlife, including some that are thought unique to the mountain. Mount Wrightson can be seen from Tucson and is famous throughout the world for its abundance of birds and other wildlife. These are among the "Sky Islands" the bill would protect.

Arizona is canyon country and the bill protects many of the twisting, spectacular gorges. The Mogollon Rim, which marks the edge of the Colorado Plateau, opens onto many of these extraordinary environments. West Beaver Creek, West Clear Creek, Fossil Springs, Hellsgate, and the Kanab Creek adjacent to the Grand Canyon and the Paria Canyon-Vermillion Cliffs are wilderness lands of unmatched beauty on the Arizona Strip.

Arizona is red rock country where the colorful cliffs and bluffs of fantastic geologic formation have inspired awe and wonder in people from all over the world. Red Rock-Secret Mountain and Munds Mountain both near Sedona, Ariz., are two of the new wilderness areas in this bill that would preserve these sights.

Water is especially precious in Arizona and we have made a special effort to preserve the State's rapidly diminishing riparian areas. In addition to some of the canyon-country wilderness areas, incomparable places like Bear Wallow, the Salt River Canyon and the Salome wilderness, where streams have carved surreal shapes out of bedrock, are protected by this bill.

And, finally, Arizona is indeed semiarid desert. The Chiricahuas, the Galiuros and portions of several other proposed wilderness units preserve example of this most delicate, misunderstood and underappreciated environment.

In addition, the bill designates a 41-mile stretch of the Verde River as a component of the National Wild and Scenic Rivers System. The Congress has not added a new river segment to our protected rivers inventory for more than 5 years and it has never placed a desert river in the system. It is time to end this unfortunate record on both counts. I am happy to say that the administration also supports this designation.

All in all, H.R. 4707 would designate 39 new wilderness areas in Arizona. Thirty-one areas totaling 834,000 acres are on national forest land and eight areas totaling nearly 290,000 acres are governed by the Bureau of Land Management. Only three forest areas totaling 71,000 acres are designated for additional wilderness study, two of them to complete study units already created in New Mexico. I think it is one of the major accomplishments of this legislation that we virtually eliminate the limbo of the further planning category on Arizona's forest lands.

Let me say something about how we arrived at this bill, which I think is rather remarkable for its level of support. More than 1 year ago I began to urge interested parties in Arizona to focus on how they would sort out the RARE II question. I was pleased to be joined by the entire Arizona delegation in that effort last summer. Since that time, we have been in almost constant discussion and negotiation with environmentalists, miners, timber people, cattlemen, and many, many others in trying to hammer out an acceptable proposal. We made every effort to have this built from the bottom up in Arizona, not imposed on Arizona from Washington. A lot of voices in Arizona said it could never be done. But I think this bill before the House today, while it does not completely satisfy the interest of any group, fairly and adequately addresses the interest of all groups in our State.

We have incorporated the RARE II proposal with a bill already passed by the Senate to designate the Aravaipa Canyon, a very meritorious proposal sponsored by my good friend, BARRY GOLDWATER. We incorporated another proposal, cosponsored by the entire Arizona delegation, dealing with BLM and Forest Service lands in the Arizona Strip. This measure, too, was built from the bottom up over several years of difficult, painstaking negotiations. It is an extraordinary example of what cooperation and compromise between business and conservation groups can produce, even when the subject is as emotional and controversial a subject as wilderness.

So I am proud to bring this bill before the House today: Proud of a bill that settles the land management question on nearly 3 million acres of public lands for the foreseeable future so that ranchers, miners, timber people, and other users of the land can get on with intelligent planning for their business; proud of a bill that was put together by the hard work, cooperation and spirit of compromise of so many Arizonans; and most of all, proud of a bill that preserves more than 1 million acres of my State as my father and my father's father knew it when they came to Arizona and helped to build it, as I have known and enjoyed it throughout my life, and so my children and my children's children can know it and enjoy it throughout their lives.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the House to pass this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time has expired.

The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 4707, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. STUMP. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

PERMISSION TO FILE CONFERENCE REPORT AND MAKING IN ORDER CONSIDERATION OF CONFERENCE REPORT ON TOMORROW OR ANY DAY THEREAFTER ON H.R. 4072, WHEAT IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1983

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers have until midnight tonight to file a conference report on the bill (H.R. 4072) to provide for an improved program for wheat, that it may be in order to consider the conference report on Tuesday, April 3, 1984, or any day thereafter, and to waive all points of order against the conference report and its consideration, except under clause 4, rule XXVIII, and that the conference report be considered as read when it is called up for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I take this time simply to confirm with the gentleman that this has been checked with the minority. That is my understanding, and am I correct?

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, it has been cleared. We are in agreement, and it has been cleared with both my ranking minority member, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN), and the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE MEDIA ACCENTUATES THE NEGATIVE IN COVERAGE OF REAGAN ECONOMIC RECOVERY

(Mr. SOLOMON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, the Wall Street Journal reported recently on a survey of national media coverage of the Reagan economic recovery conducted by Holmes Brown, president of the Institute of Applied Economics. Mr. Brown concluded that the networks, instead of being nonpartisan annotators, were in reality alchemists who turned good news into bad. The media accentuated the negative in their coverage, implying that underneath the waves of prosperity tugged an undercurrent of economic misery.

I submit Mr. Brown's article for the RECORD. I think it provides a healthy dose of reality after living in the never-never-wonderland of the nightly news.

For example, in 1983, 95 percent of all economic statistics were very positive. Yet, the 3 networks, reporting on them 104 times during that year, ended their report 86 percent of the time on a negative note.

I guess you could say that to the national news media, Mr. Speaker, a round of silver lining is a dark cloud.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 16, 1984]

HOW TV REPORTED THE RECOVERY

(By Holmes M. Brown)

The national economy improved dramatically during 1983—but you might not have realized it if your only source of information had been the nightly news programs of the three major television networks.

How did the networks manage to turn the good news into bad news? According to a recent survey by the Institute for Applied Economics, the transposition was done by concentrating on the pockets of recession within the overall recovery, thereby implying that behind the good news of falling inflation and rising employment there were black clouds of economic misery.

SIX-MONTH SURVEY

When the sea change in economic news occurred in 1983, one might have expected that the networks would follow their practice during the recession of concentrating on the economic news and substantiating it with human-interest stories. To find out, the Institute for Applied Economics helped conduct a six-month, seven-night-a-week survey of the three major networks. We examined three key questions concerning network performance:

Did the networks fully report the news of the economic recovery?

Did the networks bias their reporting to play down the positive impact of the economy?

Did the networks use negative case studies to detract from the generally positive economic news?

Unemployment fell to 8.2% in December 1983 from 10.7% a year earlier. Total employment grew by four million during 1983.

On July 8, the Labor Department announced a drop in unemployment. CBS reported that while the Labor Department said the figures didn't justify claims of a true economic recovery, the president's top economist was calling the unemployment figures a new milestone in the business upturn. Dan Rather's coverage undercut the credibility of the administration's interpretation of the statistics. Reporter Ray Brady emphasized there were 1,250,000 jobless people seeking only 350,000 available jobs, and focused on worsening unemployment in certain industrial states. The entire emphasis of the report was on those who remained out of work—not on those who were returning to work.

In October, unemployment continued to fall, this time to 8.7% from 9.1% a month earlier, the lowest rate in 20 months. The three industries hit hardest by the recession—construction, mining and manufacturing—all showed improvement.

On Nov. 4, ABC stated that the unemployment drop was the result of many jobless Americans ending their search for work. The overall interpretation was that the "news is not as good as it sounds." Again the focus was not on the enormous number rehired, but on those yet to be rehired. ABC then implied that the Reagan administration's economic policy was a complete failure, and that there was a "chorus of demands that the government develop a national industrial policy" for which ABC turned to Democratic presidential candidates for their views. The news report that began with a 0.4-percentage-point drop in unemployment concluded: "With so many factory workers unemployed, political pressure for an industrial policy will continue to grow."

In November, unemployment dropped sharply to 8.4% from 8.7% a month earlier, the lowest level in two years. In just two months, the total of unemployed Americans dropped well over a million.

ABC used the Dec. 2 unemployment announcement to focus on those left behind by the recovery. Although the November unemployment figures in 45 of the 50 states were down. ABC did a story that began, "Now those unemployment figures again; it's here in the Midwest that unemployment is most severe." They located two upper-middle-class men who had been unemployed for 1½ years and focused on their experiences, with a story that lasted more than four minutes. A story that began with a 0.3-percentage-point drop in unemployment ended in complete despair and talk of suicide.

Another major positive statistic during the time of the study was the increase in the gross national product. In the third quarter, it grew at a robust 7.7% inflation-adjusted annual pace, surprising even the most optimistic economists.

NBC reporter Irving R. Levine, on Oct. 22 when the GNP boost was announced, delivered one of the most negative stories of the survey. The report focused on "pockets of poverty where recovery is still just a dream," undercutting President Reagan's economic policies and their relationship to the recovery. Mr. Reagan was shown saying "virtually every sector of the economy . . . is expanding, creating new hope in a more secure future." Mr. Levine focused on the limited areas where things were getting worse, stating that "beyond small programs to retrain workers, the administration is closing its eyes to regions bogged down in recession and sees no need to alter its economic policy."

Inflation continued to abate during the year. The producer price index grew by only 0.6% in 1983, the smallest increase in 20 years.

In July, the inflation rate for the first half of 1983 was announced at only 2.9%, a sharp decline from 3.9% a year before. CBS followed this news with a story featuring economist Pierre Rinfret, who said: "We kept the country in recession for three years, we've created unemployment as high as 13 million people, we idled most of the factories in this country, and put most of industry flat on its back. If you can't beat inflation with that, you can't do anything."

Food prices were also reported down, but that good news was also immediately countered by another economist who forecast that the weather was about to push prices back up. When inflation was rampant, television news regularly featured segments in supermarkets. Now that inflation was under control, there were no such segments. On July 28, Dan Rather reported: "Many people argue that any time inflation stays down, there's good news. Some others argue, yes, but the way you get it down matters, and if it stays down too much for too long the wealthy benefit disproportionally." Mr. Rather went on to relate a story about union work contracts, the ultimate implication give that bringing inflation under control—the biggest single political issue in the country months ago—was somehow, now that it had been accomplished, bad news, not good.

Factory output increased 6.5% during the year, according to the Federal Reserve Board—the best performance in seven years.

On July 15, ABC reported that factory production had risen a remarkable 1.1% in June from May. Anchor Max Robinson gave the announcement one sentence, and immediately followed it with the statement: "However, the economic changes triggered by the recession continued." ABC then ran a lengthy story on the troubles and the closing of a plant at International Harvester, a company beset by management and financial troubles for years.

PLANTS AND EQUIPMENT

Industrial capacity has increased a full 10% since the recession began. One of the last stages of recovery is expanded investment in new plants and equipment. On Dec. 9, CBS reported on a Ford Motor Co. official who said that $168 million was to be spent to improve the auto maker's Rouge Steel Plant—despite fear that the plant would be closed. This positive news announcement was immediately followed by a Ray Brady story focusing on the reluctance of others to invest in new equipment, and describing it as "the shadow which darkens the 11-month-old economic recovery."

During the entire period of the study, there were four to 15 economic-statistics stories a month. Nearly 95% of these statistical reports were positive. However, of the 104 economic stories of an in-depth or interpretative nature that were aired during this period on the three network evening news shows, 89—or 86%—were primarily negative.

The economic news was good in the second half of 1983. The coverage on network television was still in recession.

ECONOMIC POLICIES HELP ONLY THE SUPERRICH

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, 4 years ago, then candidate Ronald Reagan asked the voters to ask themselves, "Are you better off than you were 4 years ago?" It is time to ask the question again. And if you are not a member of the superrich among us, the answer, despite the President's protestation of an overwhelming economic recovery, is a resounding "no."

It may come as a surprise to hear this. After all, the administration is claiming that unemployment has taken a downturn, inflation has subsided, and retail sales are increasing throughout the Nation. These facts are all true. But when put in the 4-year perspective, the changes in the economy do not appear to equal much of an accomplishment. Reaganomics, contrary to what the President would have us believe, has failed to produce a significant recovery. The only ones who are receiving significant benefit from the administration's programs are the superrich, and they are getting richer.

The administration's tax program, for example, was hailed as the first step on the road to economic recovery. The question is: Economic recovery for whom? Published studies have shown that the benefits gained from recent Federal tax reductions rise substantially with the amount of household income recorded. Under current policy, the richer you are now, the richer you are going to be in the future.

The view that the economy is improving for the country as a whole is supported only in comparisons of the current figures to the administration's own previous economic performance. For example, in January 1980, the unemployment rate was 6.2 percent. By November 1982, as a result of the implementation of the administration's policies, the unemployment rate had risen to 10.7 percent. When the President claims the current rate of 7.8 percent is a great accomplishment, I am skeptical. The fact is that the unemployment rate was 6.2 percent when the President took office, and now, over 3 years into his term, that rate is 7.8 percent. That does not sound like a wonderous achievement to me. I wonder how the administration can claim an improvement in the economy for taking the unemployment rate from 6.2 to 7.8 percent.

This is like buying a used bicycle, letting it deteriorate, and then trying to sell it as new. The Reagan administration is attempting to convince the American people that the economy is operating effectively. Luckily, the American people know enough about the state of the economy to recognize when economic indicators are being manipulated before their eyes. Present policies help those who need it the least—the extraordinarily wealthy Americans at the top.

Economic recovery is a misnomer when only the richest members of the population see any evidence of economic improvement. When unemployment is reduced to meaningful levels, when inflation is truly lowered, and when retail sales remain at high levels, then let the administration claim victory over the Nation's economic woes. Comparing the current economic indicators to those in 1980, and considering the present problems, it is difficult to see how current policies are successful in meeting the economic concerns of all Americans.●

Any donations under this subsection shall be coordinated through the mechanism designated by the President to coordinate assistance under the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 and shall be in addition to the level of assistance programmed under that Act. The pilot program shall be implemented by the Corporation as soon as practicable after the enactment of the Agricultural Programs Adjustment Act of 1984 and shall be operated for a period of two years after its implementation. The Secretary shall accept applications for assistance under this subtitle from persons affected by a natural disaster at any time during the eight-month period beginning (A) on the date on which the Secretary determines that farming, ranching or aquaculture operations have been substantially affected by such natural disaster or (B) on the date the President makes the major disaster or emergency designation with respect to such natural disaster, as the case may be.".

(b) Section 324(d) of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1964(d)) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "If farm assets (including land, livestock, and equipment) are used as collateral to secure a loan made under this subtitle, the Secretary shall value the assets based on the higher of (A) the value of the assets on the day before the date the governor of the State in which the farm is located requests assistance under this subtitle or the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 for any portion of such State affected by the disaster with respect to which the application for the loan is made, or (B) the value of the assets one year before such day.".

(c) The amendments made by this section shall be applicable to disasters occurring after May 30, 1983.

ECONOMIC EMERGENCY LOANS

SEC. 603. Section 211 of the Emergency Agricultural Credit Adjustment Act of 1978 (7 U.S.C. prec. 1961 note) is amended by—

(2) adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) With respect to the economic emergency loan program operated under this title during the period beginning December 22, 1983, and ending September 30, 1984, the Secretary—

"(2) as appropriate to achieve the goals of the economic emergency loan program and taking into consideration the amount of funds used for loan guarantees, may make available to eligible applicants during such period additional new contracts of insurance totaling, in the aggregate, not more than $290,000,000.".

OPERATING LOANS

SEC. 604. (a) Section 313 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1943) is amended by striking out "$100,000, or, in the case of a loan guaranteed by the Secretary, $200,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$200,000, or, in the case of a loan guaranteed by the Secretary, $400,000".

(b) Section 316(b) of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1946(b)) is amended by—

(1) in the second sentence, inserting "(or, in the case of loans for farm operating purposes, fifteen years)" after "seven years"; and

(2) in the fifth sentence, striking out "The interest rate" and inserting in lieu thereof "Except as otherwise provided for farm loans under section 331B of this title, the interest rate".

FARM LOAN INTEREST RATES

SEC. 605. The Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1921 et seq.) is amended by inserting after section 331A the following new section:

"SEC. 331B. Any loan for farm ownership purposes under subtitle A of this title, farm operating purposes under subtitle B of this title, or disaster emergency purposes under subtitle C of this title, other than a guaranteed loan, that is deferred, consolidated, rescheduled, or reamortized under this title shall, notwithstanding any other provision of this title, bear interest on the balance of the original loan and for the term of the original loan at a rate that is the lower of (1) the rate of interest on the original loan or (2) the rate being charged by the Secretary for loans, other than guaranteed loans, of the same type at the time of the deferral, consolidation, rescheduling, or reamortization.".

CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

SEC. 606. Section 336 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1986) is amended by—

This prohibition shall not apply to a former member of a county committee provided for in section 332 of this title upon a determination by the Secretary, prior to the acquisition of such interest, that such former member acted in good faith when acting on or reviewing such application.".

LIMITED RESOURCE BORROWERS

SEC. 607. Section 346 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1994) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, not less than 20 per centum of the loans for farm ownership purposes under subtitle A of this title, and not less than 20 per centum of the loans for farm operating purposes under subtitle B of this title, authorized to be insured, or made to be sold and insured, from the Agricultural Credit Insurance Fund during fiscal year 1984 shall be for low-income, limited-resource borrowers.

"(2) The Secretary shall provide notification to farm borrowers under this title, as soon as practicable after the date of enactment of the Emergency Agricultural Credit Act of 1984 and in the normal course of loan making and loan servicing operations, of the provisions of this title relating to low-income, limited-resource borrowers and the procedures by which persons may apply for loans under the low income, limited-resource borrower program.".

AMORTIZATION OF DELINQUENT FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION LOANS

SEC. 608. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Agriculture may develop and implement a program for the amortization of delinquent Farmers Home Administration loans from future revenues generated by timber crops planted and managed on lands previously used to produce commodities or pasture and subject to Farmers Home Administration liens. The Secretary shall submit a report to Congress by October 1, 1984, outlining the feasibility of such program and the plan for its implementation.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4072) to provide for an improved program for wheat, submit the following joint statement to the House and Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report.

The Senate amendment struck out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute text. The committee of conference recommends a substitute for both the House bill and the Senate amendment.

Except for clarifying, clerical, and necessary conforming changes, the differences between the two Houses and the substitute agreed to in the conference are noted below:

TITLE I—WHEAT

(1) PROVISIONS FOR THE 1984 CROP

(a) The House bill requires the Secretary of Agriculture to provide for an acreage reduction program for the 1984 crop of wheat under which the farm wheat acreage would be limited to the farm acreage base reduced by 30 percent, consisting of a 20 percent reduction under an acreage limitation program and a 10 percent reduction under a paid diversion program. (Sec. 3(2))*

The Senate amendment is the same, except that the Secretary must provide for a reduction of not more than 30 percent of the farm acreage base, consisting of not more than a 20 percent reduction under the acreage limitation program and of a 10 percent reduction under the paid diversion program. (Sec. 102(2))

(b) The House bill provides that the diversion payment rate shall not be less than $3 per bushel, except that the rate may be reduced up to 10 percent if the Secretary determines that the same program objective could be achieved with the lower rate. (Sec. 3(4))

The Senate amendment provides that the diversion payment rate shall be not less than $2.70 per bushel. (Sec. 102(4))

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. (Sec. 102(4))

(c) The House bill requires the Secretary to make advance deficiency payments available to producers who agree to participate in the 1984 wheat program. (Sec. 4)

The Senate amendment contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute deletes the House provision.

(d) The Senate amendment requires the Secretary to provide for a voluntary payment-in-kind diversion program for the 1984 wheat crop, in addition to the combined acreage limitation and paid diversion programs, under which the wheat acreage would be reduced between 10 and 20 percent of the farm acreage base at a payment rate of not less than 85 percent of the farm program payment yield. (Sec. 102(2))

The House bill provides for the same PIK payment rate but does not specify the reduction to be made under the PIK program. (Sec. 3(4))

(NOTE.—The 1984 crop wheat program announced by the Secretary provides for a voluntary PIK program with the same reduction as provided for in the Senate amendment.)

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. (Sec. 102(2))

(e) The House bill requires that for the 1984 crop of wheat the Secretary must treat land farmed under summer fallow practices in the same manner as for the 1983 crop. (Sec. 3(3))

The Senate amendment contains no comparable provision.

(NOTE.—The Secretary has announced summer fallow provisions for the 1984 wheat crop similar to those in effect for 1983.)

The Conference substitute deletes the House provision.

(f) The House bill requires the Secretary to permit the diverted acreage under the 1984 crop wheat acreage limitation and paid diversion programs to be devoted to hay and grazing. (Sec. 3(2))

The Senate amendment contains a similar provision that would require the Secretary to permit the diverted acreage to be devoted to hay and grazing but only at the option of each State ASC Committee. The Senate

*The section references following (i) the description of the House bill, (ii) the description of the Senate amendment, and (iii) the description of the Conference substitute are references to sections of H.R. 4072 as passed by the House, the Senate amendment thereto, and the Conference substitute, respectively.

amendment would also (i) make the provision applicable as well to the diverted acreage under the voluntary PIK program, and (ii) require that the terms and conditions established by the Secretary be no more restrictive than those in effect for producers who participated in the PIK program for that part of the 1983 crop of wheat planted before January 11, 1983. (Sec. 103)

(2) PROVISIONS FOR THE 1985 CROP

The Senate amendment requires the Secretary to provide for an acreage reduction program for the 1985 crop of wheat under which the farm wheat acreage would be limited to the farm acreage base reduced by not more than 30 percent, consisting of a reduction of not more than 20 percent under an acreage limitation program and a reduction of 10 percent under a paid diversion program. As a condition of eligibility for program benefits on such crop, producers on a farm must comply with the combined acreage limitation and paid diversion program. (Sec. 102(2))

The Senate amendment also provides that for the 1985 crop paid diversion program, producers would receive payment at a rate of not less than $2.70 per bushel and advance diversion payments of not less than 50 percent as soon as practicable after they enter into a land diversion contract with the Secretary. (Sec. 102(4))

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. Although the Conference substitute makes no reference to the implementation of a payment-in-kind program for the 1985 crop, the conferees note that the Secretary has discretionary authority under existing law to implement a payment-in-kind program for the 1985 crop of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, and rice if the Secretary determines that such a program is necessary and appropriate. The conferees understand that the summer fallow provisions in effect for the 1984 wheat program will also apply to the 1985 program. (Secs. 102(2) and 102(4))

TITLE II—FEED GRAINS

(3) TARGET PRICES

The Senate amendment establishes the target price for the 1985 crop of corn at not less than $3.03 per bushel—the same as for the 1984 crop. Under current law the minimum target price for the 1985 crop of corn would be $3.18 per bushel. (Sec. 201)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

(4) ACREAGE LIMITATION AND PAID DIVERSION PROGRAM FOR FEED GRAINS

The Senate amendment requires that, if the Secretary estimates that the carryover level of corn in the United States on September 30, 1985 (excluding any corn produced in the United States during calendar year 1985) will exceed 1.1 billion bushels, the Secretary must implement a program for the 1985 crop of feed grains under which the farm feed grain acreage would be limited to the farm feed grain acreage base reduced by a total of not more than 20 percent, consisting of (i) a paid diversion of not less than 5 percent with a payment rate of not less than $1.05 per bushel for corn, and (ii) at the discretion of the Secretary, an acreage limitation program. In addition, the Senate amendment provides that any total acreage reduction in excess of 15 percent of the acreage base for the farm (up to the maximum reduction of 20 percent) must be equally proportioned between an acreage limitation program and a paid diversion program.

The Senate amendment further requires the Secretary to make advance diversion payments of not less than 50 percent to producers of the 1985 crop as soon as practicable after they enter into a land diversion contract with the Secretary. As a condition of eligibility for program benefits on the 1985 crop, producers on a farm must comply with the paid diversion program or combined paid diversion and acreage limitation program. (Sec. 202)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision with an amendment to clarify the authority of the Secretary to make price support loans and purchases available to eligible producers who cut for silage corn of the 1984 and 1985 crops. Under the Conference substitute, the loans and purchases would be based on a quantity of corn of the same crop, other than the corn cut for silage, acquired by the producer equivalent to a quantity determined by multiplying the acreage of corn cut for silage by the lower of the farm program payment yield or the actual yield on a field that the Secretary determines is similar to the field from which the silage was obtained. (Secs. 202 and 203)

TITLE III—UPLAND COTTON

(5) TARGET PRICES

The Senate amendment establishes the target price for the 1985 crop of upland cotton at not less than 81 cents per pound—the same as for the 1984 crop. Under current law the minimum target price for the 1985 crop of upland cotton would be 86 cents per pound. (Sec. 301)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

(6) ACREAGE LIMITATION AND PAID DIVERSION PROGRAM FOR UPLAND COTTON

The Senate amendment requires that, if the Secretary estimates that the carryover level of upland cotton in the United States on July 31, 1985 (excluding any upland cotton produced in the United States during calendar year 1985) will exceed 3.7 million bales, the Secretary must provide for a combination of an acreage limitation program and a paid diversion program under which the farm upland cotton acreage would be limited to the farm upland cotton acreage base reduced by not less than 25 percent. The combined program would consist of (i) a 20 percent acreage limitation program, and (ii) a paid diversion program equal to the difference between the 20 percent reduction under the acreage limitation program and the total reduction required for the farm.

If a paid diversion program is implemented for the 1985 crop, the Senate amendment requires that the Secretary make diversion payments at a rate of not less than 25 cents per pound, except that if the Secretary estimates that the carryover level for upland cotton on July 31, 1985, will exceed (i) 4.1 million bales, the payment rate will increase to at least 30 cents per pound, and (ii) 4.7 million bales, the payment rate will increase to at least 35 cents per pound.

The Senate amendment further requires the Secretary to make advance diversion payments of not less than 50 percent to producers of the 1985 crop as soon as practicable after they enter into a land diversion contract with the Secretary. As a condition of eligibility for program benefits on the 1985 crop, producers on a farm must comply with the combined acreage limitation and paid diversion program. (Sec. 302)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute would require that if the Secretary estimates that the carryover level of upland cotton on July 31, 1985, will exceed 3.7 million bales, the Secretary (i) must provide for a paid diversion program under which the upland cotton acreage would be limited to the farm upland cotton acreage base reduced by not less than 5 percent, and (ii) may provide for an acreage limitation program under which an additional reduction in acreage of up to, but not exceeding, 20 percent could be required. If the Secretary elects to implement a combination paid diversion program and acreage limitation program requiring a total acreage reduction for the farm in excess of 25 percent, the portion of the reduction over 25 percent must be provided for under the paid diversion program. In addition, the Conference substitute provides that if a paid diversion program is implemented for the 1985 crop and the upland cotton carryover level on July 31, 1985, is estimated by the Secretary to be in excess of 3.7 million bales, but not over 4.1 million bales, the Secretary shall make diversion payments at a rate of not less than 27.5 cents per pound. If the carryover level on that date exceeds the trigger level of 4.1 or 4.7 million bales, the payment rate would increase to the level in the Senate provision. (Sec. 302)

TITLE IV—RICE

(7) TARGET PRICES

The Senate amendment establishes the target price for the 1985 crop of rice at not less than $11.90 per hundredweight—the same as for the 1984 crop. Under current-law the minimum target price for the 1985 crop of rice would be $12.40 per hundredweight. (Sec. 401)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

(8) ACREAGE LIMITATION AND PAID DIVERSION PROGRAM FOR RICE

The Senate amendment requires that, if the Secretary estimates that the carryover level of rice in the United States on July 31, 1985 (excluding any rice produced in the United States during calendar year 1985) will exceed 25 million hundredweight, the Secretary must provide for a combination of an acreage limitation program and a paid diversion program under which the farm rice acreage would be limited to the farm rice acreage base reduced by not less than 25 percent. The combined program would consist of (i) a 20 percent acreage limitation program, and (ii) a paid diversion program equal to the difference between the 20 percent reduction under the acreage limitation program and the total reduction required for the farm.

If a paid diversion program is implemented for the 1985 crop, the Senate amendment requires that the Secretary make diversion payments at a rate of not less than $2.70 per hundredweight, except that if the Secretary estimates that the carryover level of rice on July 31, 1985, will exceed 42.5 million hundredweight, the payment rate will increase to at least $3.50 per hundredweight.

The Senate amendment further requires the Secretary to make advance diversion payments of not less than 50 percent to producers of the 1985 crop as soon as practicable after they enter into a land diversion contract with the Secretary. As a condition of eligibility for program benefits on the 1985 crop, producers on a farm must comply with the combined acreage limitation and paid diversion program. (Sec. 402)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision with an amendment providing for a third trigger level and associated payment rate for the 1985 crop land diversion program. Under the Conference substitute, if the Secretary implements a paid diversion program for rice and the rice carryover level on July 31, 1985, is estimated by the Secretary to be in excess of 35 million hundredweight, but not over 42.5 million hundredweight, the Secretary must make diversion payments at a rate of not less than $3.25 per hundredweight. (Sec. 402)

The conferees note that the Agriculture and Food Act of 1981 contained a series of provisions modifying the peanut price support and acreage allotment and quota programs. With respect to price support, the Act established new provisions for quota peanuts. For each of the 1983 through 1985 crops, it provides for an increase in the support level above that for the preceding crop to reflect any annual increase in the cost of production, excluding any increase in the cost of land, with a cap on the increase for any crop of 6 percent. The Secretary has, since the enactment of that legislation, revised the method for computing the cost of production of peanuts. In doing so, the Secretary has, among other things, changed the treatment of the factor of management from the manner in which it had customarily been treated in the computation. The result has been, in effect, a reduction in the computed cost of production and thus a possible negative impact on the support price for quota peanuts not intended by Congress. The conferees urge the Secretary to reconsider this action so that the support level for quota peanuts may be determined in the manner prescribed and intended by Congress when it adopted the 1981 Act.

The conferees further note that when Congress made major revisions in the peanut program in 1981, a primary objective was to move in the direction of placing quotas in the hands of those who actually produce the peanuts. A series of statutory changes were designed to achieve this objective. One of the changes provided that any required reductions in the State quota were to be achieved by reducing the quota for each farm in the State to the extent that the quota had not been produced on the farm—in some cases, if the quota had not been produced in 2 of the 3 preceding years. Another change encouraged those who were not producing peanuts to sell their quotas to actual producers. Under the literal terms of the law, some purchasers of quotas under the latter change have been caught by the former—their newly-bought quotas have essentially been "reduced away" since the quotas had not been produced in 2 of the 3 preceding years. Other similar situations exist. To avoid inequitable results that may arise in certain cases, the conferees remind the Secretary that there is authority in section 702 of the 1981 Act to achieve the necessary quota reductions "on such fair and equitable basis as the Secretary may by regulation prescribe".

TITLE V—AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

(9) EXPORT ASSISTANCE

The Senate amendment expresses the sense of Congress that, as soon as practicable after enactment of the bill, the President should implement certain actions, proposed by the Administration to complement the provisions of the bill, to further assist in the development, maintenance, and expansion of United States agricultural export markets as follows:

(1) For fiscal year 1984, the President will—

(i) request that an additional $150 million (in addition to the February 1984 supplemental request for $90 million) be appropriated by Congress to carry out programs under Public Law 480, and

(ii) direct the Secretary to increase funding for the Commodity Credit Corporation export credit guarantee program by at least $500 million over current budgeted levels; and

(2) For fiscal year 1985, the President will—

(i) request Congress to appropriate at least $175 million over the fiscal year 1985 budgeted level to carry out programs under Public Law 480,

(ii) direct the Secretary to increase funding over the fiscal year 1985 budgeted levels, or the levels otherwise required by law, by at least $1.1 billion for the CCC export credit guarantee program and by at least $100 million for CCC direct export credit programs, and

(iii) request that Congress appropriate, or direct the Secretary to use CCC funds in the amount of, $50 million over the amounts specified above, for additional Public Law 480 funding or for additional direct export credit assistance through CCC, in such proportions as the President determines. (Sec. 501)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. The conferees note that severe food shortages exist in a number of poor countries. In particular, concern was expressed with regard to the drought-stricken areas of Africa. The conferees urge the Administration to move as large a volume of commodities as possible under Public Law 480 to Africa for use in those areas where needed. (Sec. 501)

(10) ACQUISITION AND DONATION OF ULTRA-HIGH TEMPERATURE PROCESSED MILK

The Senate amendment requires the Commodity Credit Corporation, on terms and under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, to carry out a 2-year pilot program under which CCC will use surplus CCC dairy products—to the extent they are available—to acquire, through barter or exchange, 40,000 metric tons (20,000 tons in each year) of ultra-high temperature processed fluid milk for donation through foreign governments and public and nonprofit private humanitarian organizations for the assistance of needy persons outside the United States. The barter or exchange is to be carried out on the basis of competitive bids submitted by domestic processors. CCC may pay transportation, handling, and other charges, including the cost of overseas delivery, with respect to the donated milk. Donations must be coordinated through the mechanism designated by the President to coordinate assistance under Public Law 480, and donations are to be in addition to the level of assistance programmed under that law. On completion of the pilot program, the Secretary is to report to Congress on its operation. (Sec. 502)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. The conferees note that the Senate provision would not require CCC to do an impossible act. The stated purpose of the provision is to "prevent the waste of dairy products acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation." If it proves impossible to distribute ultra-high temperature milk to needy persons abroad without undue waste, CCC would not have to do so. The provision simply requires CCC to carry out a pilot program for 2 years using 20,000 metric tons of ultra-high temperature milk each year if surplus CCC stocks are available. The provision provides that the ultra-high temperature milk will be available for donation through foreign governments and public and nonprofit private humanitarian organizations. Therefore, CCC would have to receive requests from foreign nations or humanitarian organizations before it would be required to acquire or make available ultra-high temperature milk. CCC would not be required to ship milk to, or otherwise distribute milk in, areas where the milk was not needed or wanted. Moreover, the conferees intend that the pilot program be operated in such a manner as not to disrupt commercial markets. Accordingly, the conferees expect the Secretary and CCC to take reasonable precautions to assure that commodities furnished under this provision will not displace or interfere with sales that might otherwise be made. (Sec. 502)

(11) EXPANDED AUTHORITY FOR THE USE ABROAD OF COMMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION STOCKS

The Senate amendment expands the current authority for CCC to donate surplus dairy products to needy persons in foreign countries under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 to include donations of CCC acquired wheat stocks as well for direct distribution, and for sale and use for barter as approved by the Secretary, of the donated dairy products and wheat for the benefit of needy persons. Any such donation, sale, and barter would be made through foreign governments and public and private nonprofit humanitarian organizations. The Senate amendment further authorizes CCC to pay transportation, reprocessing, packaging, and similar costs associated with such donations and to enter into multi-year agreements to provide the donated commodities. The proceeds and services realized from the sale and barter by humanitarian organizations would be used for activities approved by the Secretary that are consistent with providing assistance to needy persons. In addition, the Senate amendment prohibits the use of any proceeds from the barter or sale of the donated commodities to meet the operating and overhead expenses of any humanitarian organization through which they are distributed, requires that the donations under this provision be coordinated with assistance provided under Public Law 480, and requires that the donations be in addition to assistance programmed under Public Law 480. (Sec. 503)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute provides for the donation of dairy products and wheat for carrying out title II of Public Law 480, as approved by the Secretary, and for such purposes as approved by the Secretary. The provisions of section 203 of that Act, relating to the incidental expenses which may be borne by CCC, would apply to the donated commodities and products. Under the Conference substitute, agreements may be entered into to provide dairy products and wheat in installments over an extended period of time. To the maximum extent practicable, expedited procedures shall be used to carry out these provisions. The type of expedited procedures to which the Conference substitute makes reference are those that have been developed recently by the Administration to expedite the flow of section 416 dairy products donated abroad under current law.

The Conference substitute would permit the sale and barter of the donated commodities and products, but restricts such sales and barter to those approved by the Secretary and solely for the following purposes—

(1) sales and barter which are incidental to the donation of the commodities or products, such as sales and barter of goods which are damaged or otherwise unfit for distribution to needy people,

(2) sales and barter, the proceeds of which are used to finance the distribution, handling, and processing costs of the donated commodities in the importing country or other activities in the importing country that are consistent with providing food assistance to needy people, and

(3) sales and barter of commodities and products donated to intergovernmental organizations, insofar as they are consistent with normal programming procedures in the distribution of commodities by those organizations.

Except as authorized by the foregoing provisions, no portion of the proceeds or services realized from such sales or barter may be used to meet operating and overhead expenses. The Conference substitute also provides that the cost of commodities furnished and expenses incurred under section 203 of Public Law 480 in connection therewith would be in addition to the level of assistance programmed under Public Law 480 and not considered expenditures for international affairs and finance. In no event may dairy products and wheat be made available for disposition in amounts that will, in any way, reduce the amounts of commodities that traditionally are made available through donations to domestic feeding programs or agencies. (Sec. 502)

TITLE VI—AGRICULTURAL CREDIT

(12) SHORT TITLE

The Senate amendment provides that this title may be cited as the "Emergency Agricultural Credit Act of 1984". (Sec. 601)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

(13) NATURAL DISASTER EMERGENCY LOANS

(a) The Senate amendment requires that the Secretary accept applications from and make or insure natural disaster emergency loans to otherwise eligible applicants that conduct farming, ranching, or aquaculture operations in a county contiguous to a county where the Secretary has found that such operations have been substantially affected by a natural disaster or by a major disaster or emergency designated by the President under the Disaster Relief Act of 1974. This provision is applicable to disasters occurring on or after May 31, 1983. (Sec. 602(a))

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. (Sec. 602(a))

(b) The Senate amendment requires that the Secretary accept emergency loan applications from persons affected by a natural disaster at any time during the 8-month period following the date (i) on which the Secretary determines that such persons have been substantially affected by the natural disaster, or (ii) the date on which the President makes the major disaster or emergency designation with respect to the natural disaster affecting the applicants. This provision is applicable to disasters occurring on or after May 31, 1983. (Sec. 602(b))

(c) The Senate amendment provides that if farm assets (including land, livestock, and equipment) are used as collateral for an emergency loan, the Secretary is to value the assets based on the higher of (i) their value on the day before the date the governor of the State in which the farm is located requests Federal assistance under the emergency loan provisions of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act or the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, or (ii) their value 1 year before such day. This provision is applicable to disasters occurring on or after May 31, 1983. (Sec. 602(c))

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. (Sec. 602(b))

(14) ECONOMIC EMERGENCY LOANS

The Senate amendment provides that, with respect to the $600 million economic emergency loan program operated during the period beginning December 22, 1983, and ending September 30, 1984, the Secretary is to make $310 million available in insured loans to eligible applicants. The Senate amendment also provides that the Secretary may make an additional $290 million available for insured loans to eligible applicants, as appropriate to achieve the goals of the economic emergency loan program and taking into consideration the amount of funds used for loan guarantees. (Sec. 603)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

(15) OPERATING LOANS

(a) The Senate amendment raises the loan limits for farm operating loans. The loan limit for direct or insured farm operating loans to any one borrower would be $200,000, instead of $100,000 as under current law. The loan limit for guaranteed farm operating loans to any one borrower would be $400,000, instead of $200,000 as under current law. (Sec. 604(a))

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. (Sec. 604(a))

(b) The Senate amendment extends the maximum repayment period for farm operating loans that are consolidated or rescheduled from 7 to 15 years. (Sec. 604(b))

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. (Sec. 604(b))

(16) FARM LOAN INTEREST RATES

The Senate amendment provides that any Farmers Home Administration loan made for farm ownership, farm operating, or disaster emergency purposes (other than a guaranteed loan) that is deferred, consolidated, rescheduled, or reamortized is to bear interest on the balance of the original loan and for the term of that loan at a rate that is the lower of (i) the rate of interest on the original loan, or (ii) the rate currently being charged by the Secretary for loans (other than guaranteed loans) of the same type at the time of the deferral, consolidation, rescheduling, or reamortization. (Sec. 605)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

(17) LIMITED RESOURCE BORROWERS

The Senate amendment provides that not less than 20 percent of the insured farm ownership and insured farm operating loans made during fiscal year 1984 shall go to eligible low-income, limited resource borrowers. The Senate amendment also provides that the Secretary shall, as soon as practicable after the date of enactment of the bill and in the normal course of loan making and servicing operations, notify Farmers Home Administration farm borrowers of the provisions pertaining to low-income, limited resource loans and the procedures by which persons may apply for such loans. (Sec. 606)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. The conferees intend that funds designated for farm operating loans for low-income, limited-resource applicants may be used within a State for farm operating loans for other applicants to the extent that funds designated for farm operating loans for low-income, limited-resource applicants exceed the demand for those funds. (Sec. 607)

(18) CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

The Senate amendment prohibits any officer or employee of the Department of Agriculture—who acts on or reviews an application made by any person under the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act for a loan to purchase land—from acquiring, either directly or indirectly, any interest in such land for 3 years after the date on which the action on the application is taken or review of the application is made. (Sec. 607)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision with a modification. As modified, the conference substitute applies to officers or employees of the Department of Agriculture, including members of Farmers Home Administration county committees, who act on or review applications for loans to purchase land. The prohibition does not apply to a former member of the FmHA county committee if the Secretary finds that the former member acted in good faith in acting on or reviewing the loan application. The conferees intend that the Secretary make such a determination only on the basis of clear and convincing evidence submitted by the former member and after consideration of all the relevant circumstances. The conferees point out that the provisions of this section would not apply to a county committee member who recuses himself from any consideration of or action on a particular loan application.

The conferees intend that the Secretary, to the maximum extent feasible, make arrangements for the operation or leasing of any interest in farmland acquired or held by the Secretary under the provisions of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act and the Emergency Agriculture Credit Adjustment Act of 1978 through the use of bid procedures deemed to protect the Government's interest in such property.

It is also the intention of the conferees that the Secretary carefully manage the sale of such property in order to protect the value of the Nation's farmland. In general, land should not be offered for sale in areas in which there are already excess quantities of farmland on the market. (Sec. 606)

(19) AMORTIZATION OF DELINQUENT FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION LOANS

The Senate amendment authorizes the Secretary, in his discretion, to develop and implement a program for the amortization of delinquent Farmers Home Administration loans from future revenues generated by timber crops planted and managed on lands that were previously used to produce commodities or pasture and that are subject to existing FmHA liens. The Secretary would be required to report to Congress within 180 days after enactment of the bill on the feasibility of such a program and the plan for its implementation. (Sec. 608)

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The Conference substitute adopts the Senate provision. (Sec. 608)

SENATE—Monday, April 2, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, March 26, 1984)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable ROGER W. JEPSEN, a Senator from the State of Iowa.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

But the meek shall inherit the earth; and they shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace.—Psalm 37: 11.

God of peace, help us to find the way of peace. Make us wise and sensitive in our relationships with other nations. Help us to find the balance between response and restraint. Save us from national pride which assumes we are to police the world, and national selfishness which abdicates responsibility to the world.

Gracious Lord, while we are seeking peace in the world, let us not make war in the Senate. May we demonstrate in this body the peace which we seek among nations. May we be peacemakers in our homes, with neighbors, with those of other races, those of differing social or economic status, and with those whose religious convictions differ. Free us from the hypocrisy which talks peace among nations, while we war among ourselves. In the name of the Prince of Peace we pray. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., April 2, 1984.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable ROGER W. JEPSEN, a Senator from the State of Iowa, to perform the duties of the Chair.

STROM THURMOND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. JEPSEN thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, after the two leaders are recognized under the standing order, two Senators will be recognized on special orders of not to exceed 15 minutes each, to be followed by a period for the transaction of routine morning business until 1:30, after which the Senate will resume consideration of House Joint Resolution 492, the supplemental appropriations measure. The pending question when we resume consideration of the joint resolution will be the Melcher amendment, on which there is a time limitation by unanimous consent of 2 hours to be equally divided.

Mr. President, I hope we can make good progress on this joint resolution today. I expect it will take most of this week to finish this measure. I hope not, but I am afraid so.

It is the hope of the leadership on this side that we can finish the joint resolution and get on to the budget package before the week is over.

DEATH OF FORMER REPRESENTATIVE JOE L. EVINS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I learned with great sorrow over the weekend of the death of our former House colleague, Joe L. Evins. I plan to join the other members of the Tennessee congressional delegation and thousands of Tennesseans tomorrow at his funeral in his hometown of Smithville, Tenn.

Joe Evins served for 30 years in the House of Representatives. He was known as a real workhorse, but he did not lose contact with the people he loved in the Fourth and Fifth Districts of Tennessee.

On any given day, Joe Evins could be found chairing an important House appropriations subcommittee meeting, that would determine the fate of multimillion dollar appropriations for the Corps of Engineers, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Atomic Energy Commission, and other agencies. The next day, he could be back in Smithville, walking down the same leaf-covered roads, talking to the same friends on the street corner, just staying in touch with his people.

He was never too busy to hear another social security claim or a plea for a Veterans' Administration loan. And this service was rewarded when he ran for reelection—12 times with no opposition.

He was a believer in the committee system, quoting Woodrow Wilson that "Congress assembled is Congress on display, but Congress in Committee is Congress at work." He also knew that there were times in the legislative process when it became important to set aside short-term political gains for a much larger goal. It was his policy to avoid extremes and to move toward reason and moderation.

Joe Evins stated that he did not favor legislation that represents extremism—that he believes in working with his colleagues in Congress to achieve agreements and accords that represent the views of the great majority of Americans. For those who would give the Federal Government a blank check and for those who would cut Government funding to the point of extinction, Joe Evins would search for the middle ground, the commonsense approach to a problem.

He grew up in courthouse politics in DeKalb County with his father serving as a magistrate for 35 years and mayor of Smithville for another 15. Joe Evins was Smithville's first newspaper delivery boy, a graduate of DeKalb County High School and Vanderbilt University. He earned his law degree from Cumberland University Law School in Lebanon, Tenn., and practiced in Smithville.

During World War II, he served 2 years of military service in Washington and 2 more in England, France, and Germany. At the end of his tour of duty, he returned home and launched his own political career.

But the best summation on Joe Evins probably came in 1976 when he voluntarily retired from the Congress.

I had no doubt that I could be reelected, but I had long decided it was time to step down. I have seen some people stay in Congress until they get too old and become inefficient. I wanted to quit on top because I have had just about all the honors that one could have.

Mr. President, I have no further need for my time under the standing order. I offer it to the minority leader if he has need for additional time.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the minority leader is recognized.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the Chair and I thank the majority leader. I do not need additional time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR KASTEN

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

VOTING PRACTICES IN THE UNITED NATIONS

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, in 1982 President Reagan honored me with appointment as one of the two Members of Congress who serve each year as U.S. delegates in the General Assembly of the United Nations in New York. I was already familiar at that time in general terms with a pattern of decline in U.S. influence in the United Nations. The senior Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) while he was serving with distinction as President Ford's Permanent Representative to the United Nations, spoke about some of the reasons for this decline. He focused world attention dramatically on the moral lapses of the U.N. majority. When the General Assembly cast its shameful vote approving a resolution equating Zionism—the National Liberation Movement of the Jewish people—with racism, Ambassador Moynihan aptly described it as a victory for "the jackals."

A year before my appointment to the U.N. delegation, I had shared Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick's outrage at the vicious lies against the United States contained in the declaration of foreign ministers of the nonalined movement of nations issued during the opening weeks of the 1981 U.N. General Assembly. Ambassador Kirkpatrick sent letters of protest to Ambassadors of each of the nonalined movement member nations that she considered to enjoy more or less friendly bilateral relations with the United States. Even some of the nations that had joined the consensus on these false and profoundly offensive charges contained in that communique were recipients of U.S. foreign aid.

Although the Kirkpatrick letter was a message of protest, its intent was by no means simply retaliatory and its impact far from negative. Fundamentally, this major gesture by our distinguished Ambassador during her first General Assembly was an affirmation that the Reagan administration takes the United Nations seriously, that it cares about what goes on in the world body. Indeed, as I was to observe during my time in New York in 1982, Ambassador Kirkpatrick continually reminds her staff that, during her tenure, their motto should be "we take the U.N. seriously, and we care." The replies to Ambassador Kirkpatrick's letters of protest demonstrated the salutary consequences that can come from taking a plain, clear stand for United States national interests. Some Ambassadors replied, rather sheepishly, "We had not thought you Americans ever paid attention to our declarations." Some of these expressed sincere appreciation that our new diplomatic team in New York had taken notice. Some even decided to enter public reservations against the anti-American portions of the nonalined declaration. Others were defiant. Still a few other U.N. Ambassadors wrote to Ambassador Kirkpatrick asking why they had not received letters of protest. Does this mean, they wondered, that you Americans do not consider us friends?

Mr. President, my time at the United Nations in New York impressed upon me the profound problems of the organization and the problems of our own position in the organization far more vividly than I can detail in these few minutes. Like Ambassador Kirkpatrick, I have learned a lot of things I had never expected to learn. I never expected, for instance, that Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko would accuse us of flagrantly and illegally interfering in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. Nor did I quite expect to discover such a magnitude of disjunction between the voting power in the General Assembly and the strength of actual financial support from assessed membership dues. The combined membership dues of 80 members of the United Nations—which is to say a majority of the General Assembly—constitutes less than 1 percent of the total dues collected for the U.N. assessed budget. The United States, which has only one vote in the General Assembly, alone is assessed with 25 percent of the U.N. budget.

My direct experiences with the abuses suffered by the United States in the United Nations led me to believe that Congress must take a more active role in monitoring U.N. votes and activities. Accordingly, I authored an amendment, subsequently enacted into law, which requires a yearly report on U.N. voting practices. This law requires the Secretary of State and the Permanent Representative to the United Nations to report annually to Congress on voting practices in the world body. The first such report, with an introductory essay by Ambassador Kirkpatrick, was released by the Department of State on February 24 of this year, and as a Senate document by the Committee on Appropriations on March 22. It is an illuminating and useful tool for evaluating and assessing our relations with our fellow U.N. members' States, especially those who are recipients of U.S. assistance. So illuminating have I found the report, Mr. President, that I intend to deliver a series of statements, each concerning voting practices on a separate key issue or cluster of issues that came before the General Assembly or the Security Council last year. Among these matters is the campaign to delegitimize Israel's presence in the United Nations and other international organizations, and to stigmatize those associated with Israel. Another is the situation in Afghanistan, brutally occupied by 100,000 Soviet troops waging a war of sheer terror against civilian villagers. Another is the comparable situation in Communist-occupied Cambodia, and still another is the threatened status of the Caribbean and Central America and the strategic southern flank of the United States.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee that oversees foreign aid programs, I wish to examine, in an upcoming series of statements, the relevance of certain voting patterns in the United Nations to certain patterns of American foreign assistance. They will seek to examine what patterns exist between our aid policies and the U.N. voting practices of recipients of our aid. I wish to be clear that I am fully in accord with Ambassador Kirkpatrick's position as expressed in a statement before my Appropriations Subcommittee that U.N. voting practices ought not to be the only, nor necessarily even the major, consideration in our aid policies. Nevertheless, these voting practices must seriously be taken into account.

Mr. President, in presenting my series of statements on voting practices in the United Nations, I should like to associate myself with the robust spirit of confidence in America's values and role in the world that Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick has exhibited since she entered office. When our Ambassador arrived at the United Nations in 1981 someone asked her what would be the difference between the new administration's policies and those of the previous one.

She replied: "We have taken off our 'kick me' sign." He asked: "Does that mean that if you're kicked, you'll kick back?"

Ambassador Kirkpatrick answered: "Not necessarily. But it does mean that if we're kicked, at least we won't apologize."

Mr. President, the American people are contributing over 1½ billion tax dollars annually toward the U.N. budget, and they contribute additional billions each year in various forms to many of the nations who play important roles in the activities of the United Nations. Our support for the United Nations and the assistance we provide to other nations symbolizes our commitment to the principles of the U.N. Charter and our dedication to world peace and the improvement of the quality of life in nations less fortunate than ours.

American taxpayers have a right to know how their tax money is being spent in the United Nations and through our foreign aid programs. They have a right to know that this money is not being misspent and abused. It is to promote and protect this right that I shall be presenting my series of statements on U.N. voting practices.

Mr. President, starting tomorrow, I will begin a discussion of the 10 most important votes affecting U.S. interests during the 38th U.N. General Assembly. As part of that discussion, I will be presenting tabular material showing those countries which voted against us on these issues, together with the amount of bilateral foreign assistance they are scheduled to receive in fiscal year 1985, the amount received during the current fiscal year, and the total amount of assistance each of these countries has received from 1946 through the fiscal year 1985 request. I am confident that my colleagues will find the information I will be presenting over the next 9 days to be very interesting and informative.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary and introductory statement to this report by the Honorable Jeane J. Kirkpatrick appear in the RECORD following my remarks, together with a table showing all U.N. General Assembly plenary votes with their percentage coincidence with U.S. votes, a narrative explaining those 10 issues, and a table showing how each country voted on the 10 key issues I will be discussing.

There being no objection, the materials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT BY AMBASSADOR JEANE J. KIRKPATRICK

VOTING PRACTICES IN THE UNITED NATIONS

A. What the report is and is not

This report provides the "comparison of the overall voting practices in the principal bodies of the United Nations" requested by the Congress. From these comparisons there can be inferred the "degree of support by the government of such country during the preceding twelve month period of the foreign policy of the United States." Naturally, the data presented here refer only to the U.N. context and do not take account of support for U.S. policy in the other contexts. The report describes all the plenary votes cast at the regular session of the Thirty-Eighth General Assembly (1983), and also the voting records of those nations who were members of the U.N. Security Council during 1983.

During the 1983 General Assembly, the 158 member states discussed and decided a dazzling array of issues. Many of these issues were decided by consensus with no vote recorded, but many were settled by vote. In some cases, votes were cast not only on final resolutions but on separate paragraphs as well. The resolutions dealt with an extremely broad range of subjects: the Soviet invasion and continuing occupation of Afghanistan; economic development; arms control; outer space; the Indian Ocean "Zone of Peace"; human rights in three Latin American countries; apartheid; the Arab-Israeli conflict; and others. By the end of the General Assembly, of necessity, every member had expressed itself on a very broad range of very difficult questions.

Because a General Assembly acts on so many diverse issues, the voting record of a U.N. member during a General Assembly tells us a good deal about a country's orientation in world arenas: where it stands, with whom it stands (at least in a U.N. context), and for what purposes.

In examining the voting record of U.N. member states, it should be borne in mind that relations in the United Nations are only one dimension of our relations with other countries and often are not the most important aspect of these relations. Economic, strategic, and moral factors may be and often are more important to our interests and to U.S. policy and policymakers than a country's behavior inside the United Nations. However, at the same time, that country's relations inside the U.N. are not trivial. If the decisions and policies of the key bodies of the United Nations matter, then the votes of member nations also matter.

B. Why U.N. votes matter

1. Votes Determine the Policy of U.N. Bodies

The United Nations was conceived as a kind of global parliament, organized and conducted on the same basis as legislative bodies in democratic countries. As in a legislature the General Assembly and Security Council consist of representatives who meet, adopt agendas, discuss and debate issues and eventually deal with them either by consensus or by vote. As in most democratic legislatures, votes are distributed on the basis of one country, one vote. When votes are taken, the majority decides. Votes cast in the United Nations determine the decisions that are the principal product of the United Nations.

Votes in the General Assembly and the Security Council provide mandates and guidance to the Secretary General and the Secretariat, and the diverse worldwide operations of its subgroups. U.N. decisions allocate funds, call conferences, authorize programs.

Since the U.N. System has a combined budget of over 4 billion dollars and employs over 50,000 persons, decisions concerning the use of these worldwide resources are significant indeed.

2. Votes Focus World Attention

As in other bodies organized on democratic principles, the agenda of U.N. bodies are set by their members. And the agendas of the principal U.N. bodies have a unique influence on the definition and perception of global problems.

To an extent often not appreciated in the United States, discussions, debates and votes in the United Nations are followed by the world press. U.N. affairs are covered extensively in the press of many less developed nations, and are closely followed by the media of most European countries. Subjects discussed in major U.N. fora come to be widely regarded as important. Because of their ability to fucus attention on some subjects and ignore others, the agendas of major U.N. organizations influence the definition of what is and is not important in the world; what is a problem, what is a problem worthy of "world" attention.

This is the reason efforts to frame the U.N. agenda are made by those who seek to manipulate world opinion. Cuba has worked hard to have Puerto Rico inscribed on the agenda of successive General Assemblies as a problem of "decolonization," in spite of the fact that the people of Puerto Rico enjoy full self determination. In so doing Cuba has sought not only to embarrass the U.S., but to create a problem where none exists, simply by defining a relationship as a problem. For the reverse reasons, the Soviet Union and her associated states try to keep off the agenda subjects such as repression in Poland, the Libyan invasion of Chad, the downing of the Korean airliner, etc.

Manipulation of U.N. agendas achieves the desired results. When year after year Security Council resolutions focus on Israeli "practices" as violations of the Fourth Geneva Convention and ignore greater violations by other countries, there is a powerful tendence for many to come slowly to believe that Israel is especially guilty of gross human rights abuses. Conversely, the continuing focus of U.N. bodies on the Palestinian refugee question has kept it higher on the agenda of world politics than the plight of other, more numerous refugee populations, and has won it especially generous financial support.

If the only human rights abuses ever noted by the United Nations take place in Israel, or in Latin American nations fighting Communist insurgency, the impression spreads that these countries are uniquely guilty of gross abuse and lawless treatment of their citizens. Conversely, if African, Arab, Asian, Soviet bloc governments escape attention or censure for human rights abuses, the impression is cumulatively created that they are both powerful enough to silence critics and not so bad in any case.

3. Votes Define "World Opinion" on Major Issues

The decisions of the United Nations are widely interpreted as reflecting "world opinion." For this reason they are endowed with substantial moral and intellectual force. The cumulative impact of decisions of U.N. bodies influence opinions all over the world about what is legitimate, what is acceptable, who is lawless and who is repressive, what and who are successful and not successful, who are and are not capable of protecting themselves and their friends in the world body. The commitments and policies of the U.N. itself, the settlement of disputes, and the cumulative impact of U.N. decisions affect perceptions of power, effectiveness, and legitimacy. Examples abound.

Each year large majorities of the General Assembly put on record their disapproval of the occupation of Afghanistan and Kampuchea and request the withdrawal of all foreign forces from these countries. Even though the Afghanistan and Kampuchea resolutions do not name the occupying powers, their meaning is clear and is understood by everyone. The large votes for these resolutions make clear that the majority of member states understand and disapprove what has happened and is happening in those two states, and that Soviet influence in the U.N., though indubitably great, is not large enough to prevent the expression of disapproval.

There are various ways U.N. bodies can damage a country's reputation. South Africa has been damaged by being subjected to continuous denunciation and longstanding exclusion from U.N. bodies. And the determined effort to make Israel a pariah state reflects her adversaries' conviction that Israel could be similarly damaged. One technique is to secure passage by the Security Council of resolutions that make demands in the knowledge that they will be ignored. Refusal to respect a Security Council resolution leaves a country open to the charge that it is an "international outlaw," "not a peaceloving nation" and, therefore, eligible for further sanctions. Thus, Israel, having been requested in 1982 by Security Council action to withdraw all its troops from Lebanon, is "guilty" of noncompliance, while Syria is "not guilty" because there were never enough votes in the Security Council to demand Syria's withdrawal. The fact of noncompliance becomes yet another ground for censuring Israel in the U.N., regardless of the fact that Israel agreed to withdrawal of its troops from Lebanon simultaneously with those of Syria, and actually began a withdrawal which Syria refused even to discuss.

Omission from the agenda can also influence world opinion. When the Soviet Union is able to protect itself against being criticized by name—no matter how flagrant its violations of the U.N. Charter—it establishes itself as skillful, effective, and influential, as a power to be reckoned with in what is regularly called the international community. When its client states and allies are able to escape criticism—no matter how flagrantly they violate the United Nations Charter—the Soviets are judged influential, useful friends. Soviet success and influence in the United Nations becomes then an additional incentive to be sensitive to Soviet views and to associate with the Soviet bloc. Conversely, if, when the United States and its friends are subjected to harsh and often unfair attack, the U.S. appears to be devoid of influence, association with it becomes undesirable if not dangerous. U.N. votes thus affect both the image and the reality of power in the U.N. system and beyond.

More is at stake than a country's reputation or image, though these matter in international politics. U.N. votes help to define the limits of the permissible. If, after shooting down the Korean airliner, the Soviet Union had not been forced for the first time since the invasion of Afghanistan to veto a resolution (if nine of the fifteen members of the Security Council do not vote for a resolution, it fails and no veto is required to prevent its passage) then the impression of worldwide revulsion against attacking a civilian airliner would have been weaker. Or if, in spite of accumulating evidence on the use of deadly "yellow rain" chemicals against Hmong tribesmen, Khmer people, and others, the U.N. had not received the mandate needed to continue its investigation of the use of chemical weapons in Southeast Asia, the impression would have been created that use of chemical weapons is not taken seriously.

4. U.N. Votes Affect U.S. Foreign Policy

Actions by United Nations bodies, especially by the Security Council, have greater consequences for U.S. foreign policy and the world than often is realized. At the time of writing (February, 1984), the situation in Lebanon is rapidly deteriorating. President Amin Gemayel's government is under progressively serious attack from Syrian-supported forces, U.S. Marines are departing Beirut, and the possible enhancement of the U.N. role in Lebanon is once again under discussion. Had there been a U.N. decision to deploy a substantial observer group in Beirut earlier, before the government of Lebanon had been so weakened, it might have discouraged some of the fighting and helped lay the groundwork for a UN peacekeeping force to replace the MNF. The failure to deploy observers thus may have had important effects on the evolution of events in Lebanon, the viability of its government, the security of Israel, the role of the Syrians (and Soviets) in the region, and the options available to the United States. The Security Council's pending decision on a proposal to deploy U.N. troops in Beirut could also have important repercussions for U.S. policy. And Lebanon is by no means an isolated case.

Nicaragua works hard to move the discussion of Central American problems from the regional level into the U.N. where it can profit from the support of the Soviet bloc and its friend. Nicaragua's initiatives have important implications for the Contadora process, which in turn is important to U.S. policy and prospects in Central America.

The influence of U.N. decisions in the context and conduct of U.S. foreign policy may be incremental, rather than sudden or dramatic, but its cumulative importance should not be underestimated.

C. What U.N. votes tell us

Votes in the United Nations, as in other political systems, are determined not only by cool consideration of the facts and values involved in a particular issue, though these may figure in the final decision. Votes are also a consequence of group identifications and loyalties, and the personal, moral, and financial incentives perceived to be at stake.

There is much votes cannot tell us. The votes of a Congressman do not necessarily tell us where and how he stands within his party or within the Congress, what he cares most deeply about, his relation with his peers, or about the views of his constituency, or his legislative assistant. A vote does not even tell us to which party a Congressman belongs. A Congressman may argue that his votes do not accurately reflect his true values and preferences but instead result from election year pressures of his constituency, his party, the financial pressures on him, and the issues he was forced to vote on. But cumulatively a Congressman's votes tell us in a general way about where he stands on various kinds of issues, what he stands for, and whom he stands with.

Similarly in the United Nations, a country's votes do not tell us everything we need to know because they are not the only way of acting in the U.N., and because their meaning is sometimes indeterminate. Votes are not the only means by which countries express their support and opposition inside the United Nations. Speeches, lobbying inside closed group caucuses and in the corridors, making "threats and promises" (as an African delegate put it) have their effect though they show up on no tally. A number of countries work behind the scenes to aid the U.S. in modifying offensive resolutions. Moreover, the meaning of a single vote, when cast, is not self-evident. A cumulative voting record, however, tells us what a government judged to be in its best interest in the U.N. context. When an African government votes with the majority of African States, or with the majority of the nonaligned group, for a resolution that is unfairly critical of the United States for violating the South African arms embargo, that African state is not necessarily expressing hostility to the U.S.; it may simply believe there will be more unpleasant (personal or official) consequences from voting no than from voting yes.

1. The Determinants of Voting

Over time, a country's votes on important issues reflect its choices among values and priorities. Many factors influence how a nation votes inside the United Nations, just as many factors influence how a Congressman votes. Among the most important of these are:

(1) A country's form of government and basic political values. This factor is most important at the extremes. Warsaw Pact Communist states almost always vote together; democratic countries often vote together.

(2) Its geographical location. Geography—as seen in groups such as the Organization of African Unity or the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN)—are an important influence in the U.N. voting.

(3) Its level of economic development. On a range of issues involved in the "North-South" dialogue, less developed countries tend to vote together, as do the industrialized countries.

(4) Its bilateral relations. Bilateral relations, especially economic, military, historic relations may be important determinants of voting inside the U.N.

(5) Its group memberships inside the United Nations. Is it a member of the OAU, the Group of 77 or the Non-Aligned Movement?

(6) The character of the groups of which it is a member. Is the group cohesive and disciplined, like the Soviet bloc, or a loose, shifting coalition, such as the Non-Aligned Movement?

(7) The balance of power inside the United Nations sometimes is a factor. If the outcome of a vote appears a foregone conclusion, then many governments seek to join the majority.

(8) The groups with which a country is associated outside the United Nations may also be an influential determinant of its behavior inside the U.N. Countries closely allied with the Soviet Union outside the U.N. form the most cohesive bloc within the U.N. Membership in the British Commonwealth, which has no formal existence in the U.N., nevertheless on occasion has been an important determinant of voting.

(9) Estimates concerning whether vital bilateral relations outside the United Nations will be affected by a vote in the U.N. An important reason for the decline in U.S. influence in the U.N. was the perception that we did not care much about what went on there.

(10) The facts and values involved in a particular issue.

This list of determinants of voting behavior, while not exhaustive, illustrates the range of influences which contribute to a voting decision on a particular issue. With regard to any particular vote, the factors influencing a country's vote may push the country in conflicting directions. Except in the case of the Soviet bloc, therefore, it is difficult to predict with certainty how a country will vote in a particular instance.

Although it is rarely possible to predict the relative influences of the various factors in any given vote, it is possible to formulate some generalizations.

2. The Blocs

In many ways the United Nations resembles a democratic legislature. As in a legislature where members combine in parties or factions, nations have banded together into blocs whose combined strength is many times that of the individual members. Many of the blocs work together only in the U.N., where they function much as parties do in a legislature. The blocs offer influence, security and fellowship. They caucus, discuss, adopt common positions. Unless there are countervailing influences, the blocs control the agenda, the debate, and the decisions.

The blocs are geographical, ethnic, political and cultural in character. There is the Organization of African Unity, which unites all African nations except South Africa. There is the Latin American Group, in which are gathered the nations of Latin America and the Caribbean; the Group of 77, or the G-77, which consists of some 120 developing countries who gather together to try to promote economic development. The Islamic Conference links together all Moslem nations, Arab and non-Arab.

In some cases, relationships that exist among countries outside the United Nations determine their behavior inside the U.N. The most striking example is how countries linked to the Soviet Union vote in the U.N. exactly as the Soviet Union votes. The relationships between the Soviet Union and Ukraine, Poland, Afghanistan are exactly the same in the Security Council or General Assemly as in the world. The Soviet Union decides.

Other groups that exist outside the U.N. function as blocs inside the organization. The European Community and ASEAN are examples, though neither is nearly so tightly disciplined and monolithic as the Soviet bloc. The Commonwealth, which links together in loose association the former members of the British empire, does not normally play a role in U.N. affairs. However, these ties are occasionally mobilized as in the Falklands conflict, when the U.K. herself was embroiled in a war with a non-Commonwealth member. Similarly, the French government maintains especially close ties to former French colonies. In several of these cases, bilateral economic assistance reinforces bonds of loyalty.

Overarching and overlapping all these groups is the most important bloc of all: the Non-Aligned Movement. Founded twenty years ago on the initiative of Tito, Nehru and Nasser at a time when the United Nations agenda tended to be dominated by East-West rivalries, this has become the most powerful bloc in the United Nations. The Non-Aligned group has grown to include some 100 of the 158 nations in the United Nations. It contains all of the African and Arab, most of the Asian and some of the Latin American states. Support from the Non-Aligned Movement guarantees the success of any resolution in the General Assembly or in any of the committees or organizations of the United Nations that operate on the principle of one country, one vote. The opposition of a united Non-Aligned Movement guarantees defeat, even inside the Security Council, where the Non-Aligned constitute a caucus of eight in a body of fifteen.

The power of the blocs depends, of course, on their cohesion as well as on their size; they are not equally cohesive. The Latin American group suffers from the same tendency toward schism that characterizes the politics of most Latin American nations. It is almost never able to agree on a common position, usually because Cuba, Guyana and Nicaragua (often joined by Mexico) block consensus. The Organization of African Unity, on the other hand, operates with notable sophistication and discipline and is usually able to reach and maintain common positions. So does the European Community. On the other hand, deep divisions inside the Arab world prevent the Islamic Conference States from acting together on most issues except those involving Israel.

The Non-Aligned, with its approximately 100 members is heterogeneous and cannot agree on many issues. But despite this heterogeneity, it is sufficiently cohesive to have influence in all arenas in the United Nations.

3. Some Consequences of Bloc Politics

As already noted, the blocs have overlapping memberships, and most U.N. members belong to more than one bloc. The fact that a number of Marxist-Leninist states are simultaneously members of the Soviet bloc and one or two other blocs as well is a source of great strength for the Soviet Union because it gives Soviet bloc representatives access to the internal procedures of other blocs. As Chairman of the Non-Aligned Movement from 1979 to 1983, Cuba was able to radicalize the NAM further and sometimes to make it serve as an instrument of Soviet foreign policy. Meanwhile, as a member of the Latin American group, Cuba was able to bloc Latin consensus on candidate slates thus forcing the selection of Latin America's representatives in many UN bodies into the General Assembly where moderates' chances of success would be lessened. Overlapping memberships of the Soviet bloc with the Arab, African, Non-Aligned group and G-77 in many cases produce the famous "automatic majority" of Third World and Soviet bloc nations. The United States, on the contrary, is a member of no group at the United Nations, though we work closely with many nations. This fact makes us rather like a country without a party in the midst of a body with a highly developed party system.

There are important rewards for belonging to one of the blocs and following its decisions. There are the pleasures of group solidarity and the displeasures of peer pressure and disapproval. There are also more concrete rewards. Blocs function as mutual protection associations and membership guarantees allies. Alliances among the blocs often guarantee each member enough allies to protect each against censure.

The United Nations response to the Libyan invasion of Chad offers an opportunity to observe how the system works. As the Libyans move in force into Chad, that country appealed to the Security Council for help. Chad is a member of the Organization of African Unity. The Non-Aligned Movement, and, as a former French colony, enjoys a special relationship with francophone Africa and with France. Libya, however, is also a member of the OAU, the NAM, and, in addition, of the Arab group, the Islamic Conference and usually votes with the Soviet bloc. By virtue of these memberships, Libya was able to divide and immobilize the African group and the NAM. Chad finally could count for help only on the francophone African members of the Security Council—Togo and Zaire—and on those western countries—the U.S., the U.K., the Netherlands and France—committed to trying to discourage the use of force in international disputes. The result has been that to this day the small, poor African nation which has been the object of invasion and occupation, has been unable to obtain relief from the Security Council.

For most countries, most of the time, bloc membership is probably the most important single determinant of their votes. But, except in the case of the Soviet bloc, it is not automatic. And although the blocs inside the United Nations importantly influence behavior inside the U.N., they rarely are more important than relations outside the U.N.—provided countries believe that what happens inside the U.N. will have significant consequences for their relations outside.

D. What the votes tell us about the U.N. today

The record in both the Security Council and the General Assembly establishes that the diverse members of those bodies are more often able to reach consensus on issues than is usually believed to be the case. Ten of twenty Security Council resolutions and 183 of 331 General Assembly actions were adopted without a negative vote. Though behind-the-scenes negotiations often were tense and prolonged, they usually resulted in consensus. The price of consensus, however, often was a rather anodyne resolution which did not contribute materially to the solution of the problem in question.

The record also shows that when no consensus existed, outcomes more often were favorable to Soviet positions than to Western views. This is partly because the political culture of the U.N. often filters the world through quasi-Marxist categories and partly because of Soviet organizational influence. Overall, the nations of the Non-Aligned Movement and Western nations agreed on about 20% of their votes, while 80%, of the time the Non-Aligned and the Soviet bloc were in agreement. Obviously, this is damaging not only to the United States but to all the industrialized democracies.

Perhaps more disturbing than the disparities in outcome, was the fact that the United States was the only major country singled out for criticism by name in several resolutions of the Thirty-Eighth General Assembly. One such resolution falsely attacked the U.S. for violating the South African arms embargo (which in fact we have not done); one unjustly attacked the U.S. for nuclear collaboration with South Africa; a third attacked the U.S. for its assistance to Israel.

Neither the Soviet Union, which maintains more than 100,000 occupation troops in a brutal war against Afghanistan, violates chemical warfare agreements, and shot down an unarmed civilian airliner; nor North Korea, whose bombs murdered South Korea's ministers in Rangoon; nor Vietnam, which maintains a huge occupation force in Cambodia; nor Libya, which invaded Chad and promotes worldwide terrorism; nor Iran, which is seeking systematically to eliminate its Baha'i population; nor states, which created great hardship by expelling tens of thousands, have been the object of specific disapproval in a U.N. resolution.

Explicit criticism of a country by name has become, inside the U.N., something very different than in most human situations. It is an act of powerful blocs against countries unable to defend themselves in the U.N. context. Only those countries which lack the protection of membership in an influential bloc are singled out for explicit criticism in the U.N. Such selective censure necessarily is discriminatory and unfair. Moreover, the political use of the U.N. to embarrass countries unable to protect themselves undermines the Organization's capacity to do the valid and important tasks for which it was created.

E. What can be done

Patterns of voting behavior in the U.N. are less rigid than is sometimes supposed. With the single exception of the Soviet bloc, it should not be assumed that membership in this or that group will necessarily determine how a country votes or speaks on a given issue. Overlapping memberships create conflicting claims; relations outside the United Nations may conflict with relationships inside the U.N. There are significant variations in the votes on important issues among the nations of Africa, the Islamic Conference and in the Non-Aligned bloc. It should never be assumed that membership in this or that bloc constitutes an automatic reason for casting a hostile vote. Togo and Zaire, for example, almost always agreed with the Western nations in the Security Council votes; Zimbabwe was usually on the other side of conflicted issues; yet all three are active members of the African and Non-Aligned groups. It is only necessary to look at the voting support scores to understand that countries within each of the groups diverge on important issues.

The United States has many good friends among the members of the United Nations and in most of its blocs. If countries which are good friends of the U.S. outside the U.N. do not always act like good friends inside that body, an important reason is surely our failure to communicate that the United States cares deeply about U.N. outcomes. Experience has shown that when we let other nations know we are deeply interested in an outcome, those others are much more likely to take our values and interests into account in casting their votes. The goal of the Administration in the United Nations is to encourage that body to contribute, as it was originaly intended, to the peaceful resolution of disputes among nations, the enhancement of human freedom and human rights, the encouragment of economic development and well-being of peoples. The Congress' help in underscoring our national concerns and values, and their connection with voting patterns in the U.N. context, surely will help.

THE THIRTY-EIGHTH GENERAL ASSEMBLY: ALL VOTES

A NOTE ON METHODOLOGY

The tables contained in this section reflect percent coincidence of countries' votes with the U.S. in the 38th UN General Assembly Plenary. This coincidence takes into account all recorded votes, including procedural motions and paragraph votes, which occurred in the Plenary but does not include issues approved without vote or by consensus. The percent coincidence is calculated on the basis of Yes/No votes only and does not take into account abstentions or absences. This method provides less distortion than any alternative. Table 1 is broken down according to geographical regions. Tables 2-9 reflect voting coincidence according to significant regional or political groupings.

TEN MOST IMPORTANT VOTES AFFECTING U.S. INTERESTS DURING THE 38TH UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY FALL 1983

The ten votes described below were judged by the U.S. Mission to the UN as the most important affecting U.S. interests during the 38th UN General Assembly.

The ten votes selected also reflect regional and functional distribution of issues. There are two votes on the Middle East (Israel's Credentials and the Resolution on U.S. support for Israel); two on Latin America (both on Grenada); two on Africa (Apartheid and the U.S.-South Africa relationship); two on Asia (Kampuchea and Afghanistan); one on arms control (chemical and bacteriological weapons); and one on human rights (El Salvador).

Vote totals shown for each vote are Yes, No, Abstain/Absent (Y-N-AB), with the US vote shown in parentheses.

1. ISRAELI CREDENTIALS

Procedural motion that no action be taken to an amendment which would not have approved Israel's credentials.

Vote: 79(US)-43-19.

2. THE MIDDLE EAST SITUATION

Resolution 38/180 E. States awareness that reported agreements between the U.S. and Israel will increase Israel's intransigence and escalate Israel's expansionist and annexationist policies; demands that the U.S. refrain from any step that would support Israel's war capabilities.

Vote: 81-27(US)-29.

3. AFGHANISTAN

Resolution 38/29. Calls for the immediate withdrawal of foreign troops from Afghanistan, reaffirms the right of the Afghan people to determine their own form of government, and calls on all parties to work for a political solution.

4. KAMPUCHEA

Resolution 38/3. Deplores foreign armed intervention and occupation by foreign forces in Kampuchea, and reiterates conviction that withdrawal of foreign forces, noninterference, and non-intervention are principal components of any just and lasting resolution of the Kampuchean problem.

Vote: 105(US)-23-19.

5. GRENADA

Motion to close debate (gag rule). Approval of this motion prevented the U.S. and others from speaking in the General Assembly debate on Grenada.

6. GRENADA

Resolution 38/7. Deplores armed intervention in Grenada and calls for immediate withdrawal of foreign troops from Grenada.

Vote: 108-9(US)-27.

7. CHEMICAL AND BACTERIOLOGICAL WEAPONS

Resolution 38/187 C: Requests the UN Secretary General with experts to pursue the investigation of violations of the 1925 Geneva protocol on gases and bacteriological warfare; requests completion in 1984 of documentation on identification of symptoms associated with use of prohibited agents.

Vote: 97(US)-20-30.

8. HUMAN RIGHTS IN EL SALVADOR

Resolution 38-101: expresses deepest concern that gravest violations of human rights are persisting in El Salvador, recommends reform, calls for comprehensive negotiated political solution, and urges all states to abstain from intervening and to suspend any type of military assistance.

Vote: 84-14(US)-45.

9. COLLABORATION WITH SOUTH AFRICA

Resolution 38/39 G: Expresses alarm at violation of arms embargo and continued nuclear collaboration by the U.S. and others with South Africa and condemns U.S. decision to approve request for seven corporations to provide service to South Africa's nuclear installation.

Vote: 122-9(US)-17.

10. SOUTH AFRICA

Resolution 38/39 A: Condemns the United States for its policy towards South Africa of constructive engagement; condemns the policies of the U.S., Isreal, and others, their transnational corporations, and their financial institutions for collaboration with South Africa; calls upon the IMF to terminate credits to South Africa; and recognizes that national liberation movements have the right to armed struggle against South Africa.

Vote: 124-16(US)-10.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KASTEN. I shall be pleased to yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator be so kind as to make the information on voting patterns of various countries available, for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or some sort of pamphlet that calls it to the attention of each Senator? I know very often, when we look at trade matters as well as matters that involve foreign aid, we could take those matters into account. When people, just as a matter of vicarious pleasure, proceed to vote against or condemn the United States for no good reason, it seems to me we ought to return the favor. When looking at something we could do just as easily as not do, from my point of view, it would be well to withhold it.

I have not been very enthusiastic about much of this foreign aid business, anyway. But if we are going to have a foreign aid program, we ought to treat those who have a way of acting as though they are our friends better than those who seem to delight in kicking Uncle Sam or glory in doing it. It ought to cost them something, especially when we are in a position to do someone a favor.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I should like, first of all, to thank the Senator from Louisiana, the distinguished ranking member of the Committee on Finance, for his comments. I want to say to him that I will be providing a detailed examination, country by country, on key votes and overall votes. I am enthusiastic about the possibility of working with the Senator from Louisiana on trade matters as well as other matters of foreign assistance because this is all related, Mr. President. I hope that, during this week, these votes will become more and more apparent, not just to Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, but also more apparent to the American public.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. KASTEN. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. The Senator knows that votes of Ambassadors to the United Nations, just as vote of Senators here in the U.S. Senate, oftentimes reflect a variety of considerations. There are times when a Senator finds he has a very good friend in this body voting contrary to his position because that person had the considerations of his own constituency to consider. When the interest of his own State seems to be in conflict with the interest of the State represented by some other friend who is serving in the Senate, you can expect each Senator to reflect the point of view of those who sent him here. The same thing, I am sure, is appropriately true in the United Nations; there will be times when other nations have a compelling reason to vote contrary to the way we would vote here. But taking all those things into account, the point should be very obvious that there will be many occasions when there is every reason why some of these nonalined countries should vote with us and no good reason why they should vote the other way. I hope that, as the Senator is analyzing those matters, he will be able to point out on some basis by careful analysis how certain nations have just been voting against us willynilly, for no good reason whatever, even when logic would suggest that they ought to be voting with us.

That is the type of thing I think we ought to be taking into consideration. It is one thing for someone to engage in an unfriendly act when he has a compelling reason to do so. It is another reason for them to do it when they have no good reason for doing so.

That is the type of thing the Senator, I know, would want to point out to us, and I hope he will be able to provide detailed information because sometimes just a cold statistic or study does not show as much as it does when you analyze it to determine what consideration if any, there was for these varied nonalined countries to vote against us.

Mr. KASTEN. I agree with the Senator from Louisiana, and I recognize that there are times when it is going to be in a country's legitimate interests to vote in a certain way. What we are trying to do here for the very first time is to put all these votes out before us so that they can be analyzed. I believe that this first report is an historic moment. Now that we are able to analyze these votes, we can go forward and look at them in terms not only of American foreign assistance but also in terms of the trade policies which have been of such interest to the Senator from Louisiana. So I am anxious to work with the distinguished Senator from Louisiana as we look at these votes and evaluate the voting patterns.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana has on occasion had some group of outstanding constituents bring in their record as to how they would judge this Senator based on his votes on a variety of issues in which they are interested. I must say that is interesting for one to have to defend his record when someone has carefully compiled a long list of votes and feels a Senator's record in representing his constituents has not been what that particular group thinks it should be.

It seems to me we certainly have a right with regard to some so-called friendly countries to call the roll and ask them to explain on behalf of their government why their representatives voted against us time after time when there appeared to be no good reason for it, especially if they think we ought to help them with some of their affairs from time to time.

Mr. KASTEN. I do not want to get ahead of myself, but in preparing this series of speeches and analyzing the votes, there is a particularly interesting group of countries whose behavior I want to quickly share with the Senator from Louisiana. There are a number of countries who voted against a resolution condemning the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and then turned and voted to condemn the U.S. rescue operation in Grenada. That is an interesting group of countries.

Mr. LONG. Yes.

Mr. KASTEN. We are going to make these kinds of comparisons as we go through the period of the next week or 10 days and develop these kinds of voting patterns. So I thank the Senator from Louisiana for his interest and I look forward to working with him.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KASTEN. I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF SENATOR PROXMIRE

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Wisconsin is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I thank the Chair.

HOW WILL NEW TECHNOLOGY AFFECT THE RISK OF NUCLEAR WAR?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, can we find salvation from nuclear destruction in reliance on improvements in nuclear weapons that will protect us from a nuclear attack? That is a tempting alternative to reliance on arms control. Many Americans feel uneasy with negotiations to end the nuclear arms race. We are not negotiating with the Pope. We have to negotiate with the Soviet Union—Communist Russia.

We do not consider the Soviets trustworthy. They have violated agreements in the past. They will do it again if they can get away with it. On the other hand, we have a marvelous scientific capability—our scientists lead the world. as the Nobel Prize record shows. We spend far more on research and development than any other country; indeed, we spend more on scientific research than all other nations in the world combined.

With few exceptions, our military technology has stayed well ahead of the Soviet Union. The Soviets have an advantage in the size of their armed forces. They have more tanks, more planes, more missile launchers, greater throw-weight and greater yield potential from their nuclear weapons. On the other hand, technology is our forte. In virtually every technological area, we have the advantage. Our planes are faster, more maneuverable, with greater firepower. Our tanks are also faster, can fire on the run, are less vulnerable, and have greater firepower. Our submarines are quieter and our nuclear armed submarines have much greater accuracy and far greater capacity to deliver nuclear weapons on the Soviet Union than vice versa. The Soviet Union has a crude antisatellite system. Ours is not deployed, but it is far in advance of anything the Soviets have on the drawing board. Our antisubmarine warfare technology decisively leads the Soviets.

In view of this clear record, why can we not rely on technology and deterrence for our salvation and just finesse the slippery treachery of agreements with Communist Russia? The trouble, Mr. President, is that the technology game moves rapidly and unpredictably. And again and again we find that whatever technological advantage we may enjoy in any particular nuclear weapon at any time, it is likely to be short lived. We found this to be true with MIRV'd missiles. Here we had a new technology that gave us a sharp advantage over the Soviet Union: We could equip a single launcher with multiple warheads and make each warhead capable of striking a different target in distant and different locations.

About the time we were congratulating ourselves on winning a critical nuclear arms advantage over the Soviet Union, we discovered that the Soviets had rapidly and expertly copied our technology. What was even worse, the development of these multiple, independent targetable, reentry vehicles, or MIRV's, by both sides had given each a devastating but highly vulnerable nuclear weapons system that would have to rely on hair-trigger, use it or lose it tactics. So what happened to our technology advantage? It ended up with a system that diminished the military security of both sides and brought nuclear war closer.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, almost any new nuclear arms technology—defensive or offensive—tends to do just this. Consider what the newest advances in technology have done to each leg of our nuclear deterrent triad: land-based missiles, bombers, and submarines. Harvard University scholars in their book, "Living With Nuclear Weapons," put the case this way for land-based missiles:

> ABM technology has advanced over the past decade but so has the offensive missile technology it is intended to counter and the advantage remains with the offense. If the Soviet Union developed a workable defensive system before the United States, for example, American officials would fear that Soviet incentives to avoid nuclear war would be diminished. A defensive-dominated world might also be less stable depending on how perfect defense systems were believed to be. In such a world, there might be heightened incentives for surprise attack, or for efforts to develop new, more decisive offensive systems.

So, sure, we can dream about a perfect American defense system that can locate and knock out incoming Soviet missiles before they could reach their American targets. We can even dream of weapons capable of spiking Soviet missiles in their launching pads. Sadly, these are dreams which contribute to the uncertainty and, therefore, the increased danger of nuclear war. Any defensive system we or the Soviets develop tends to weaken the precise basis of our prime reliance on deterrence to avoid nuclear war.

As for a second leg of the triad—bombers—advancing technology threatens that aspect of deterrence, too. The Soviets look-down, shoot-down systems with airborne radar and missiles that detect and destroy low-altitude targets could nail our bombers on the ground. The same system threatens our air-launched and sea-launched ballistic missiles.

The third leg of our triad—our sea-launched ballistic missiles based on our submarine fleet—seems relatively safe from Soviet technology at the moment, but perhaps only for the moment. The advances in antisubmarine warfare have been impressive. For now, our antisubmarine warfare technology seems well ahead of the Soviet Union. But as in other areas of nuclear weapons competition, that could change and jeopardize our sea-launched deterrent, which is by far our surest present reliance for nuclear deterrence.

This nightmare of an onrushing nuclear arms technology is what inspired Leslie Gelb, in his classic article in the New York Times, to point out that the deterrent reliance that has served the cause of peace so well for more than three decades could evaporate in the next 10 or 15 years and bring the reality of nuclear war much closer.

So, Mr. President, we cannot rely on technology to save us from the nuclear holocaust that an unrestrained arms race will bring. We literally have no alternative to arms control. The sooner, the more comprehensive, and the more verifiable the arms control treaty we negotiate with the Soviet Union the better will be the chances for our children and grandchildren to live out their lives.

MANNED SPACE STATION COSTLY AND SCIENTIFICALLY UNNECESSARY

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Senate will shortly be called upon to commit the first $150 million for the planning of an orbiting civilian space station. This relatively small first step of funding will lead to one giant leap into a highly questionable program which may ultimately cost the taxpayers $20 billion or more over the next 15 years.

Two recent articles cogently argue the folly of moving forward on this NASA-instigated outer space white elephant.

Thomas Gold, a professor of astronomy at Cornell Center for Radiophysics and Space Research at Cornell University, convincingly argues that such a space station would indeed be a misstep for mankind because it would divert funds from cheaper but scientifically more important unmanned space projects.

Mark Washburn, writing in yesterday's Washington Post, expands upon Dr. Gold's comments. He points out the tremendous costs of providing life-support and redundant safety systems for manned space flights.

Since unmanned space craft can do just about all the tasks a manned space craft can but at a considerably lower price and also perform many scientific experiments beyond the ability of manned space craft, I am at a loss to understand the need to hastily spend tens of billions of dollars on NASA's outer space version of a gigantic public works project.

I urge my colleagues to read the articles by Tom Gold and Mark Washburn, and I ask unanimous consent that these articles be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPACE STATION—A MISSTEP FOR MANKIND

(By Thomas Gold)

When, in 1957, the space age began with the launching of the Soviet Sputnik, it fired the imagination of people all over the globe. To most people it was a vindication of science fiction, a victory of "far-out thinking" over the dreary and unimaginative. Here was the first step accomplished of the ladder of science-fiction achievement, whose later rungs are manned flight around the solar system and then even to the stars.

All these things had been predicted and been said to be impossible. Who was not to say that they could not all be done? It seemed that the courageous thinkers were right and the timid would perish in ridicule.

This dream world was the very real background against which the government had to guide its space programs. Financing was dependent on the support of a broad cross-section of the people, and an appeal to their space dreams became a major factor in all planning. However useful unmanned, instrumented vehicles proved to be, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration judged manned flights to have the greater public appeal. The culmination of this policy was the "greatest show on Earth," the 1969 Apollo landing on the Moon (600 million viewers on world television), and it showed what can be achieved for $21 billion.

Alas, this giant step for mankind was not to be followed by another. The Apollo flights to the moon now look more like the end of an era rather than the beginning.

The shuttle was the next manned project, but it could fire the imagination only if it could be seen as the tool for new space conquests. Manned flights to Mars were hinted, but could not be seriously proposed.

Now NASA proposes to build a space station, and has obtained the support of President Reagan. A large space habitat is to be assembled in orbit, from smaller units that can be carried up by the shuttle. It would house several persons, and it would be kept permanently manned. A range of experiments and observations would be carried out on board. The cost? It is hardly worth quoting the $8-billion to $20-billion estimates now being made.

The expense of the space station project would be much greater than that of construction. A regular sequence of space launches would be required to supply and refurbish the spacelab. Running the space station would become the bread-and-butter work of NASA on a far higher level of expenditure than NASA is operating on now. A commitment of this kind would assure NASA and a substantial part of the aerospace industry a high level of support for a long time to come.

Even if the space station did not justify its running expenses, politically it would be extremely difficult to abandon such a program, when the initial cost had been so high. The decision to build a space station is therefore one that will fix the direction of the U.S. space program for a long time to come. Is it the right direction?

It is sometimes said that it is inevitable that man will fly to the other planets, or even to other solar systems far out there among the stars. Surely the space station is the first step in that direction, to learn how to assemble large units in orbit, and to learn how to live for long periods in space.

Unfortunately, so long as we have only the propulsion that chemical rockets can provide, an expedition to another planet is not practicable. It would require the assembly in orbit of a ship of many thousands of tons, and the cost would be very many times the cost of the Apollo program. The round-trip time to Mars would be more than two years. It is possible, yes, but it is not likely to happen.

If one day a far more efficient propulsion system is invented, then perhaps one can think again. But that will not happen overnight, and there will be plenty of time to exercise men in orbit while this new capability is being developed. The space station is not tackling the hard part of the problem; it is only dealing with the part that we know we could solve.

Another "inevitability" claim is that human populations will eventually spill out into space, and large space cities will accommodate those whom the Earth can no longer harbor. The space station is to be the first step. But if it is population pressure that is to create this situation, then first we would surely want to fill those areas on Earth that are empty at the moment but much more easily supplied with the wherewithal for living than outer space.

Another claim has been that the space station would serve as a good observation post, both for looking up and looking down. But for that it is clearly inferior to the unmanned vehicles that are already in common use. Looking down on the Earth for military surveillance or for the various studies of the Earth's surface and the atmosphere requires a variety of orbits, especially orbits that go to high geographic latitudes and orbits that are stationary with respect to the rotating Earth. The space station will only be in one low-latitude, close-Earth orbit. and it will be essentially immovable from that orbit. Furthermore, observing equipment, for the most part, has its accurate pointing upset by the slightest motion on a spacecraft. For this reason, an unmanned vehicle is far preferable.

A manned space station could act as a base for men to go out and assemble very large structures, such as radio antennas. They could serve useful purposes, both for astronomical observations and for terrestrial communications systems. But before deciding that such a construction would justify a reasonable fraction of the cost of a space station, one would have to know what purpose is to be served, whether the orbit is a desirable one, and what the costs of various methods of assembly—manned or unmanned—might be. Deciding on the means of doing a job before specifying the job itself is never a good policy.

Another suggested purpose is the manufacture of goods in zero gravity or the good vacuum of space. It certainly has not yet been demonstrated that sufficiently valuable products could be made there that could not be made on Earth, even with investments of many billions of dollars. During the quarter century of space flight, the possibility has often been discussed, yet not a single example of such a product exists. This is so despite many manned space missions that searched for things to do and settle for such experiments as determining which way guppies would swim, or whether a particular spider could build its web in zero gravity.

The one field where one cannot doubt the utility of long-duration manned space flight concerns the physiological effects that such space flight has on humans. But why would this justify a multibillion dollar program, when there is no plan in sight that requires prolonged manned space flight?

Unmanned, instrumented space vehicles are free from many of the limitations which exist for manned flight. They are cheap by comparison; light and small; they do not have to be returned; they can transmit any information that can be gathered from locations to which they go; they can be sent on a great variety of orbits and trajectories, and they can endure flights of many years' duration.

The technology of detailed remote control and of data management is advancing rapidly, and any action that an astronaut could take in an Earth-orbital vehicle could also be commanded from the ground to a remotely controlled mechanism in an unmanned spacecraft. It seems so clear to many scientists and engineers that this is the way of progress of modern technology, that the continued preoccupation of NASA with manned flight is a stumbling block.

The space station would drain funds and technological ability away from advanced unmanned projects, and slow down the evolution of our real space capabilities.

WHAT'S A SPACE STATION GOOD FOR?

(By Mark Washburn)

A Strauss Waltz plays as the gleaming space station rotates like a giant, high-tech wagon wheel in the inky void. A shuttle glides toward the busy docking bay, where another shuttle is being readied for the commute back to Earth. Inside the station, in the zero-gravity hub, scientists conduct experiments while engineers monitor space "factories" where computer chips and pharmaceuticals are being manufactured.

This is the Hollywood version of a space station, and the picture that many Americans probably have of it. But it is a far cry from the manned facility that Ronald Reagan has approved. The real thing will be a small, isolated outpost in a hostile environment, difficult and expensive to reach, tedious to live in and limited in its capabilities for conducting either scientific research or commercial operations. It will take nearly a decade to build and undoubtedly will cost far more than the current $8 billion price tag.

Reagan apparently was won over to this project by a vision of enhanced American prestige in space—a sort of Stanley Kubrick version of "America is back"—and by the prospect of a new frontier of commercial enterprise. In his State of the Union address, the president emphasized the role of the private sector in space, and there are signs that industry and private entrepreneurs are picking up on his lead.

But large as the potential scientific and industrial benefits may be from this project, the country would do well to consider carefully what it is getting for its money—and what other options may be available in space—before plunging ahead.

The manned space station will preempt vast amounts of money that could go to other endeavors, ranging from scientific exploration of the planets, to robot probes of the asteroids that could have long-term commercial benefits. Unresolved questions about our space priorities remain, and conflicts continue to fester between groups with different interests; scientists, supporters of commercial exploration and engineers whose priority is manned space exploration.

The space station, long a goal of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, had (and still has) a powerful group of critics. They include presidential science adviser George A. Keyworth II, who has expressed concern about the emphasis on manned activities; the Pentagon, which sees no military mission for the facility, and the Office of Management and Budget, which is worried about the cost. This type of space station was also opposed by large segments of the scientific community, which would prefer to see the money spent on scientific experiments and unmanned projects.

To be sure, the station's commercial role may represent the shape of things to come. There are signs that the possibility of manufacturing in space is, at last, beginning to move out of the realm of fantasy and onto corporate drawing boards. Drug production, for example, is a potentially fruitful field. McDonnell Douglas and Johnson & Johnson already have developed procedures for manufacturing pharmaceuticals in space by a process called electrophoresis, which uses the gravity-free environment to purify biological materials such as enzymes and hormones. Johnson & Johnson researchers are looking at 30 to 40 possible products, including insulin and interferon.

The computer industry is also looking skyward. IBM recently abandoned a 20-year effort to develop low-temperature computer technology in favor of a new generation of gallium arsenide "superchips." Gallium arsenide crystals have been found to grow extremely well in zero gravity.

Space is also beginning to attract the attention of venture capitalists and private entrepreneurs. Last month, a former NASA official announced he had formed a private company to build a robot space station that could be placed in orbit by the shuttle before the completion of the government's more advanced station. It would be a small platform that could be leased for manufacturing and could be serviced by shuttle astronauts.

Fairchild Corp. is planning a more ambitious, cube-shaped orbital platform for manufacturing that could be launced by the shuttle as early as 1987. McDonnell Douglas' pharmaceutical factory may be the first payload for the facility, which has been called Leasecraft and would carry automated factories or experiments into orbits as high as 1,000 miles and return them to low orbit for periodic servicing by the shuttle. Customers would rent space aboard the Leasecraft for about $3 to $5 million per month.

Despite this upbeat news, though, there are big economic, technological and political obstacles to using space as a new industrial frontier, as envisioned by space station proponents. In the '60s and '70s, it was possible to parlay a good idea, and empty garage and $100,000 into an electronics empire. But a space enterpreneur's good idea would require more like $100 million to turn it into reality.

"We don't yet have a firm customer for Leasecraft," says John Naugle, a former NASA official who is now senior director of the Leasecraft program. Naugle hopes for a definite commitment from McDonnell Douglas by July of this year. But McDonnell Douglas, in terms of research and development, is years ahead of any other potential customer. "There is a lot of interest," says Fairchild's William Fullwider, "but there is reluctance to take the first step. Our feeling is that once it does happen, things will begin falling in line."

Outside the aerospace industry, however, there seems to be little appreciation of the commercial possibilities offered by a gravity-free, vacuum environment. "The educational process is underway," says Naugle.

It will be an expensive education, with little hope of profits in the near future. In the case of microelectronics, the price of producing space-grown gallium arsenide crystals is daunting: about $30,000 an ounce. And the government space station will not be ready for 10 years—a millenium in the fast-paced computer industry.

What comes down from space must first go up. But no private launching capacity yet exists, so any industrial exploitation of space depends at this point on a government subsidy, in the form of a ride on the shuttle. Does this administration, which is so in favor of free enterprise, really want to become involved in this kind of government "targeting" of growth industries in space?

As the twin failure of booster rockets for the Westar and Palapa satellites on the last shuttle trip showed, the financial risks are huge. The two satellites were insured for $75 million each. As one businessman said recently, industry is reluctant to "put a billion dollars into orbit."

Given these uncertainties, the current excitement in Washington over the commercial possibilities of a manned space station has scientists worried. They fear that the project will swallow up funds that could better be spent on other endeavors with bigger long-term payoffs. They fear that the engineers and enthusiasts of manned activity in space will get the lion's share of the funds—as happened during the Apollo program, and later during the production of the shuttle.

NASA's planetary exploration program was especially hard hit by the shuttle. The spectacular successes of the Viking mission to Mars and the Voyager mission to the outer planets have not been followed up by new missions. During the shuttle-building era, only one new planetary mission was funded, and that—the 1986 Galileo mission to Jupiter—has faced repeated delays due in part to problems with the shuttle, which is to be the Galileo launch vehicle.

Hoping to avoid another hiatus, NASA established the Solar System Exploration Committee (SSEC) in November 1980 with the intention of designing a logical, practical, and inexpensive planetary strategy for the '80s and beyond. The first report of the group, which was dominated by scientists, recommended a core program consisting of 14 new missions, two of which have received start-up funds. The Venus Radar Mapper, with a planned 1988 launch date, should give scientists a detailed look at the surface of that cloud-shrouded sister planet. The 1990 Mars Geoscience Climatology Orbiter will be the first American mission to the Red Planet since the two Viking spacecraft landed there in 1976. In addition, the SSEC hopes to win approval for a comet rendezvous and/or asteroid flyby mission, and a Saturn orbiter with a probe of Saturn's moon, Titan, to take place in the early or mid-1990s.

These missions were chosen according to three basic criteria: high scientific priority, moderate technological challenge and modest cost. Central to this game plan are the Planetary Observer and the Mariner Mark II, inexpensive general-purpose spacecraft "buses" that will deliver scientific instruments to their planetary targets. In contrast to the Vikings and Voyagers, which carried more than a dozen individual experiments, the Mariner Mark IIs and Planetary Observers will be limited to three or four.

The recommendations would eliminate the cycles of feast and famine that have plagued the plantetary program, but at the cost of ambitious, science-intensive missions such as Voyager. A Mars Rover, a sort of "Viking with treads," capable of traversing thousands of miles of the rugged Martian terrain, has been at the top of planetary scientists' wish lists for years, but the SSEC report specifically excluded it, along with other billion dollar missions. Not considered because of cost factors were such missions as an unmanned Mars mission to bring back samples of the planet's surface materials; a round-trip probe through the tail of a comet to gather samples; and a soft landing and data-gathering mission to Titan.

Scientists' optimism about the SSEC program has been tempered by the 1985 Reagan budget proposal, however. Although the administration signed on for the Venus and Mars missions, funds have not been allocated for the development of the Planetary Observer spacecraft, which is regarded as a keystone to the SSEC plan. Also, funds for the analysis of data already collected by Viking and Voyager have been cut back. Some scientists regard the budget proposal as an implied rejection of the basic SSEC program. The omissions in the budget proposal, they fear, may be harbingers of the same sort of slow death-by-attrition that the SSEC was designed to prevent.

Another worry is that even after experiments are built and launched, the funding needs of the space station may cut into operating budgets, as has happened in the past.

If the SSEC program survives, planetary scientists should enjoy a modest renaissance during the coming decade. The Galileo spacecraft, to be launched in 1986, will arrive at Jupiter in 1988 and drop a probe into the seething atmosphere of that giant planet. During the following three years, the Galileo Orbiter will return data about Jupiter's four major moons, Callisto, Ganymede, Europa, and Io. The pictures should be even more spectacular than those from Voyager; surface details as small as 20 meters across will be seen on Ganymede and Io.

Galileo is supposed to be followed by the Venus and Mars missions, and possibly two others. One is a mission to the asteroid belt that would give us our first detailed look at a potentially important class of astronomical objects. Metals and organic materials mined from the asteroids may become a primary resource for both Earth and space in the 21st Century. (In the long run, it will be cheaper to mine the moon and asteroids than to ferry raw material to bases and stations in space from Earth.)

The other mission, to Saturn, would send a probe into the opaque atmosphere of the giant moon Titan, where a planet-wide ocean of complex organic molecules may mimic conditions on Earth before life began.

Meanwhile, Voyager 2 is still alive and reasonably well. Launched in 1977, it is headed for a January 1986 encounter with the planet Uranus and, if the spacecraft survives, an August 1989 flyby of Neptune.

Barring funding cuts incurred by the space station, non-planetary scientists should also have a productive decade as a result of the scheduled launching aboard the shuttle of the Hubble space telescope in 1986. It will see seven times deeper into the universe than the biggest and best ground-base observatories.

If these U.S. scientific projects sound lavish, it is worth noting that other nations are also busy pursuing scientific goals. The Soviet planetary exploration program continues to focus on Venus, where Veneral probes have already made successful landings. A joint Soviet-French mission to Halley's Comet is scheduled for 1986. Halley will also be the target of a Japanese scientific mission, launched by a Japanese rocket, and the European Space Agency's first independent deep space effort, the Giotto mission.

Despite the valuable knowledge gained from scientific endeavors, the Reagan administration seems to want a more tangible return from its space investment.

At this point, the shuttle is central to the entire U.S. space effort. It is needed to launch scientific experiments, commercial tests and, ultimately, to carry aloft the components of the manned station.

The shuttle has limitations. Its range is extremely limited. Due to its fuel capacity and other design factors, it cannot fly much higher than about 300 miles above a sphere 8,000 miles in diameter; if the Earth were a peach, the shuttle would barely be above the fuzz. But the real action in space, experts agree, will take place in geosynchronous orbit, 22,300 miles above the surface of the planet. The low shuttle orbits are worthless for communications satellites and present a variety of difficulties for industrial and scientific operations. (For example corrosion from oxygen atoms from the upper atmosphere.) While the shuttle is adequate for research and development, it cannot stay aloft long enough for full-scale production operations.

The administration's proposed answer to the latter problem is the space station. The station would be composed of four to six modules and would be home for six to eight astronauts, who would spend up to three months aboard before being rotated home. In an environment similar to Antarctic research stations or atomic submarines (think of "Run Silent, Run Deep," not "2001"), the astronauts would conduct experiments, carry out research programs and supervise the operation of commercial ventures.

Accordingly to Bruce Abell of the White House science office, "Almost anything you're talking about doing in space will require a space station. It's appropriate to view a space station as a kind of doorway."

However, some see it differently. "The contention that this is a way station to the planets is really bankrupt," argues Cornell University's Carl Sagan. The shuttle-imposed limitations of a low-orbit space station would make it a stepping stone to nowhere without the concurrent development of "space tugs" or second generation shuttles capable of reaching high orbit. "A case has not been made for a permanent human presence in low orbit with this technology," says Sagan flatly.

Critics contend that most of its proposed functions could be performed with equal efficiency and vastly greater economy by machines instead of people. Proponents of manned spaceflight argue that robots aren't smart or flexible enough to do everything that needs to be done in space; no machine can replace a good man (or woman) with a screwdriver. On a recent shuttle flight, an astronaut saved a photographic experiment by doing a delicate repair job on a jammed film drive. On the same flight, though, another astronaut ruined a crystal-growing experiment when he accidently kicked the "off" switch.

The cost of maintaining human expertise in space is enormous. It now costs about $1,000 a pound to deliver a shuttle payload to low orbit—a price that underwrites the expense of life support and redundant safety systems for the astronauts. It is as if the price of a washing machine including room and board for the Maytag repairman!

NASA and White House spokesmen steadfastly deny that the Reagan space station proposal is mainly a response to Soviet space activities. Still, the proposal came just a month after the release of a Congressional Office of Technology Assessment report which concluded that the Soviets, with their Salyut spacecraft, already have what amounts to an operational space station.

"The Soviet space program is really quite a ways behind what we're capable of doing today," says Bruce Abell. But the Soviets are developing their own reusable shuttle. They have far more experience than NASA in studying the long-term effects of weightlessness. And they are working on a new generation of heavy-lift expendable boosters and a heavy-lift shuttle that could have twice the payload capacity of the American shuttle.

"The Soviet space station program," according to the OTA report, "is the cornerstone of an official policy which looks not only toward a permanent Soviet human settlement of their people on the Moon and Mars. The Soviets take quite seriously the possibility that large numbers of their citizens will one day live in space." Many observers expect that the Russians will attempt a manned mission to Mars sometime in the 1990s.

The Soviet Union's space station seems to fit well into its long-term plans for space, while the U.S. station seems more in line with America's "space spectacular" philosophy. As indicated earlier, the low-orbit station the administration is planning simply does not make good sense, given the limits imposed by technology.

There is, however, one circumstance under which such a space station could be justified. That is a station built in cooperation with other spacefaring nations, including the Soviet Union, Japan and the countries of Western Europe. A multinational station would not eliminate the drawbacks inherent in any small, low-orbit facility. But it would be cheaper for the United States, thus saving funds for other ventures. It would avoid duplication—a problem that is going to become greater as more nations get into the space act. And it undoubtedly would produce side benefits that are difficult to forecast. By bringing together the world's best scientists and engineers, a multinational station would spin off new ideas and approaches to the challenge of space.

The administration seems receptive to internationalizing the station. NASA officials report that as much as one-fourth of the cost could be borne by Western Europe, Japan and Canada.

Space is no longer the exclusive playground of the superpowers. The European Space Agency is developing its own launch vehicle in the Ariane series, which is already competing with the shuttle for commercial payloads. An advanced, reusable version of the Ariane may be ready by the end of the decade.

European participation in the space station would prevent the Pentagon from hopping aboard later, after the bills have been paid, as it did in the shuttle program. ESA is a purely civilian program, and its members include neutral countries Ireland, Austria and Switzerland. ESA participation would, therefore, preclude a military role for the station.

Inviting the Soviet Union in would provide an extremely important symbolic role for a multinational "Earthport." It would symbolize a commitment to a peaceful use of space, would help to relax East-West tensions and would defuse some of the Soviet and American paranoia about a "star wars" mission for future space stations. That, in itself, might justify the price.

Sen. Spark Matsunaga (D-Hawaii) has introduced a resolution calling on the president to renew the Space Cooperation Agreement (which the administration allowed to lapse in May 1982 in retaliation for Soviet policies in Poland), and to explore new avenues of peaceful cooperation in space. So far, the resolution has attracted the endorsement of such luminaries as Carl Sagan, author James Michener, former NASA official Christopher Kraft and former astronaut Donald (Deke) Slayton, who commanded the joint U.S.-Soviet Apollo-Soyuz mission in 1975. Slayton suggests "coupling the United States' leadership in reusable, economical launch and reentry vehicles with the U.S.S.R.'s long-duration, large space station objectives."

"Our children and grandchildren would never forgive us for failing even to give it a decent chance," says Matsunaga.

Now, rather than later, is the time to think about the political, scientific and commercial opportunities that a constructive use of space offer. We need to do this thinking before we commit ourselves to another round of expensive, and increasingly dangerous space-racing. The decisions we make today will determine the human future in space, not just for the next decade, but for the next century and beyond. This may well be our last chance to give life and meaning to our own inspiring rhetoric: "We came in peace, for all mankind."

THE FORGOTTEN SUFFERING OF EAST TIMOR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I often worry about the ease with which the bustle of the Nation's Capitol can obscure the reality of suffering and persecution, especially in remote corners of the globe. Our mandate is, admittedly, to serve the citizens of this Nation, but in doing so, our influence extends globally, responding to the needs of free peoples everywhere. Therefore, we owe much to several dedicated Congressmen who have taken the time to focus our attention on the cruel slaughter of the peoples of East Timor at the hands of the Indonesian military.

Their crime? A simple desire for independence. Their punishment? Wholesale slaughter, the decimation of entire villages and the crowding of survivors into concentration camps. Since 1975, when the Government of Indonesia invaded East Timor using arms supplied by the United States, approximately one-quarter of the population of the country has been murdered. The Indonesian Armed Forces commander, Benny Murdani, has pledged to show "no mercy" in his cruel repression of the Timorese yearning for independence.

Last fall, Indonesian authorities tightened the restrictions on travel in the wartorn region, denying access even to the humanitarian efforts of the International Red Cross. At the same time, Amnesty International issued a report stating that the Indonesian military has "engaged systematically and persistently in practices of brutality." In December, a bipartisan group of 105 Members of the House of Representatives wrote to President Reagan expressing concern over reports of a new, large-scale Indonesian military offensive.

Mr. President, I think that we can feel proud of this show of concern; indeed, we can expect results, for our reputation as defender of human rights and our influence as a global power can actually serve to free a prisoner or save a life. It is a power that must be zealously fostered and preserved.

That is why we must not undermine our ability to save that one life or free that person falsely imprisoned. That is why I daily call for ratification of the Genocide Convention. Far more than anything, the Genocide Convention is a symbol of our commitment to international human rights, our opposition to events such as those occurring in East Timor. Any ambiguity in the message that we send the world can only lead to a waning of our influence as the defender of civil liberties for all humanity. In this light, the Genocide Convention becomes a practical necessity; our failure to ratify becomes an inhuman crime.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to join me in seeking Senate ratification of the Genocide Convention.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond 1:30 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

HONORING UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS BASKETBALL COACH LOU HENSON

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would like to call the Senate's attention to an individual who, through his hard work and dedication, has given Illinoisans an exciting and exhilarating basketball season that has brought the State national recognition and has provided its people a deep sense of pride.

I refer, Mr. President, to Lou Henson, the head coach of the University of Illinois Fighting Illini basketball team, who this year guided his team to an outstanding 26 and 5 season that earned the team the cochampionship in the Big Ten Conference and a berth in the NCAA tournament.

Lou Henson took over the head coaching duties at the University of Illinois in the spring of 1975. Under Coach Henson's direction, the Fighting Illini have participated in postseason play for the past 5 years and this year's team clinched the Big Ten Conference championship for the first time in 21 years.

Lou Henson began his coaching career at the high school level in Las Cruces, N. Mex., in 1956 after completing his master's degree in education administration at New Mexico State University. In 1963 he moved to Hardin-Simmons University where in the 4 years he coached he compiled two 20-game winning seasons.

Coach Henson returned to his alma mater, New Mexico State, in 1967 where in 9 years as head coach his teams compiled a 173 and 71 won-loss record and qualified for the NCAA playoffs six times. In 1970, his team recorded a third-place finish in NCAA post-season play.

Now in this 9th year at the University of Illinois, Lou Henson has earned a national reputation for his tough defensive style of basketball. The acclaim is well warranted. He has molded strong defensive teams at the university and has seen two of his college pupils join the ranks of the National Basketball Association. Eddie Johnson and Derrick Harper now play for the Kansas City Kings and the Dallas Mavericks, respectively.

Mr. President, Illinoisans are rightfully proud of the work of Lou Henson and his Fighting Illini team. Coach Henson has returned the University of Illinois basketball program to national prominence and in so doing has earned the gratitude and admiration of all Illinoisans.

The skill, spirit, and sportsmanship exhibited by Lou Henson and the Fighting Illini have inspired and entertained the people of Illinois and the Nation throughout the past 9 years and their efforts are deserving of our reserved acclaim.

We are very grateful.

THE NFL–USFL RELATIONSHIP

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, recently an article appeared in the Washington Post on the subject of the present competition between the National Football League and the U.S. Football League. The USFL, it seems, is beginning to capture the full attention of its older and better-seasoned counterpart. The new league is signing top prospects out of the colleges and staging some impressive promotional campaigns. Whatever one's view is of football in the springtime, the USFL must be given credit for its extensive efforts to date. Also, whatever one's view is of the desirability of having two major football leagues in this country, the current NFL–USFL relationship represents good, healthy competition. It should remain that way.

The Post article, however, suggests that the NFL, in gearing up to meet the competition of the new league, may apply pressure to the ABC television network which currently has a contract with the USFL to televise its football games. ABC also happens to carry the NFL's games. The suggestion is that the NFL may put pressure on ABC to refrain from continuing to provide such financially healthy television support for the USFL. Such a tactic, if employed, would, of course, not be healthy competition and I sincerely hope no such activity occurs.

Just as the commodity it promotes, professional football management is also in many respects a game. It, too, must be played by the rules.

I ask unanimous consent that the Washington Post article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NFL TEAMS PLAN 'RAID' ON USFL

(By Paul Attner)

Even before National Football League owners meet next week in Hawaii to discuss ways to counter the U.S. Football League, the NFL is preparing to battle the USFL on at least two fronts—with what is being called a "counter raid" on USFL players and with possible pressure on ABC, the network that owns the rights to USFL games.

The target of the "counter raid" that many NFL teams are set to conduct would be USFL players whose contracts expire in July. An NFL source said he presumes every team in his league has talked to USFL players or their agents about signing with the NFL this summer.

Although most of the players are not big-name athletes who have been signed to long-term contracts, USFL officials admit their league could be hurt if the NFL drains off enough second-level players.

In addition, sources believe the NFL has begun placing subtle, behind-the-scenes pressure on ABC, which will televise the next NFL Super Bowl and carries Monday night NFL games.

"Don't expect anyone to ever admit ABC is being pressured," said a television source. "There are all types of antitrust problems here. But there are ways to remind ABC that by keeping the USFL alive with future contracts, it's running up the price of future NFL contracts and may force the league to look even more to cable. You don't have to threaten to get your point across."

Art Modell, owner of the Cleveland Browns and chairman of the league's television committee, vigorously denied that the NFL has talked to ABC, or will do so.

"I can speak for the entire committee on that subject," Modell said. "The USFL is doing everything they can to set us up for an antitrust suit. We've already gotten correspondence from that league's lawyers saying they have been irreparably harmed by us. The last thing we need is another lawsuit."

ABC signed a two-year contract with the USFL before last season. The network also has options to renew the contract for 1985 and 1986, and the USFL would like to raise the rights fees for both years. Those fees now would be $14 and $18 million, respectively. USFL Commissioner Chet Simmons has said that his league needs a substantial increase in television revenue, especially in a new contract starting in 1987, to survive.

NFL owners are becoming increasingly upset with ABC and its president, Roone Arledge, for bankrolling the USFL. These owners had expected that their current $2 billion TV contract would give them a healthy profit until a break-even point in 1986, its final year. But with rapidly escalating salaries due to USFL competition, teams now fear they will reach that break-even point at least a year earlier.

Regarding the player raids, it is apparent some NFL teams already have signed USFL players to unannounced future contracts. How aggressive the NFL becomes regarding future contracts will depend on action at the league meetings in Hawaii.

NFL Commissioner Pete Rozelle, who opposes an all-out war with the USFL, has said that the league may consider creating a supplemental draft of players who signed with the USFL before the NFL's regular, later draft. Tex Schramm, Dallas Cowboys president and chairman of the NFL's powerful competition committee, says there will not be any changes in the draft, although the owners could decide differently.

The USFL already is scrambling to re-sign its stars. One obvious case: the Generals' extension of Herschel Walker's contract, a move that thwarted a plan within the NFL to have Walker drafted this year by the Jets, Giants or Dallas and then signed to a future NFL contract.

"We are aware that the NFL will come after our players," said Carl Peterson, president of the Philadelphia Stars. "In some ways, I find it ironic, because that means they admit our players are better than they have been saying. But it also means we need to sign our players to longer contracts to protect ourselves."

Unlike most NFL low-key gatherings, these meetings are considered highly important to the league's future, especially considering the threat of the USFL. The competition committee, which normally concentrates on rules changes, already is trying to deal with the rival league.

It is expected to be an emotional week highlighted by sharply divided views on how to cope with the USFL. This is especially apparent concerning an attempt to move the draft from late April or early May to Feb. 1.

Although an increasing number of NFL teams support the change, it appears too few want it to make the switch now. But the matter could be taken up again during the fall meetings. The USFL, which drafts in January, has signed at least 12 potential NFL first-round choices the last two years.

Some owners believe they can put the USFL out of business by drafting earlier and then engaging in a salary war; others, backed by Rozelle, want a more subtle approach because they feel the USFL eventually will die due to spending excesses and problems caused by playing in the spring.

At the meetings, the owners also will hear a report from Rozelle regarding San Francisco 49ers owner Eddie DeBartolo, whose father owns the USFL Pittsburgh franchise. It is expected the owners will decide to exclude the younger DeBartolo from future league discussions regarding the USFL.

Modell said he expects the television committee, in an effort to help sagging ratings, will ask for more flexibility in scheduling, such as the freedom to move a game between two contending teams from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m.

The owners also will discuss the league eligibility rule and could set up an NAB-type system to allow college undergraduates to apply for hardship status. The eligibility review comes after a federal court ruling in the Bob Boris case found the USFL eligibility rule to be in violation of antitrust laws.

Coincidentally, the NFL has decided to grant Boris a special exemption and place his name in the upcoming draft pool. Boris, a former punter at Arizona, has two years of college eligibility remaining. He already has been cut by two USFL teams.

DEATH OF CLARENCE M. MITCHELL, JR.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, in tribute to a great and good public man, William Shakespeare wrote:

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mix'd in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

Those words spring to mind today, as I consider the long, distinguished life and recent death of Clarence M. Mitchell, Jr. For more than three decades the chief Washington representative of the NAACP, he was a principal architect of the landmark civil-rights measures enacted into law during that time.

Clarence Mitchell was long regarded as the "101st Senator," and we mourn him in this body as we would mourn for a colleague—not because we all agreed with him on every occasion, but because we knew him as a man of integrity who never compromised a moral principle and as a man of moderation who never abandoned his democratic beliefs to gain even the most desirable ends.

An optimist both by temperament and by policy, he placed his faith in the persuasive power of the truth—and in what he believed to be a basic human capacity to hear the truth, rightly stated, and respond to it. He enhanced the dignity of every civil-rights debate by respecting the views of others as firmly as he adhered to his own. He was a generous and humane man who never attempted to refute an opponent's argument by impugning his motives or his character.

Hubert Humphrey, who knew Clarence Mitchell perhaps better than any of us, characterized him in 1976 as I believe we all would remember him today:

. . . a man of integrity, honor and compassion—a cherished friend and a trusted comrade in battle. What more can be said of a man than that he has gained the respect of his opponents and the admiration and loyal friendship of his colleagues?

The product of that respect and admiration was a long and unparalleled record of civil-rights gains that clearly bore the stamp of Clarence Mitchell.

In the 1940's, before the time was ripe for civil-rights legislation, he inspired Executive orders like the one by which President Truman desegregated the Armed Forces, and he was the vital link through which organized labor was recruited to the cause of civil rights.

Then over the next two decades, he was directly and significantly involved in the passage of the 1957 Civil Rights Act, the 1961 law establishing the Civil Rights Commission, the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1966 and the Fair Housing Act of 1968.

These historic legislative achievements went far toward redeeming the conscience of America and broadening the scope of social and economic justice to encompass the needs and aspirations of blacks and other minorities. But Clarence Mitchell's intention was always to unify and never to divide.

He said he did not believe in thinking white or thinking black but only in thinking fairly, and he addressed his appeal consciously, consistently, and successfully to what he was convinced was a fair-minded majority of Americans.

He said that what was important was "building a democracy that is a shield for the humble and the weak as well as a sword for the strong and the just."

And he warned us that we must "repudiate those forces that would destroy us and our country by causing us to lose faith in the power of just law." He was profoundly and authentically American, and he never lost faith in this country's will and capacity to be just in dealing with all of its people.

There are few men, Mr. President, whom we could correctly call irreplaceable, but Clarence Mitchell was clearly one of that rare breed. We will miss him as a friend and colleague. But if any man ever did, he built his own monument in the living law of this great Nation. He will not be forgotten, and his works will remain a part of the Nation's permanent legacy.

But though we remember him, we cannot and we would not replace Clarence Mitchell in our hearts. Again in the words of Shakespeare:

He was a man, take him for all in all; I shall not look upon his like again.

JOHN CHUCHOLA

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, in reading a recent issue of Stars and Stripes, I came across an article about the veteran featured on the Veterans' Administration poster commemorating the February 14 "National Salute to Hospitalized Veterans." I was proud to see that the veteran pictured is John Chuchola, who now lives in the Wilmington VA Medical Center.

All veterans have contributed something to the preservation of the freedom we enjoy, but John has given more than most. John has spent all of his most productive years at sea, doing the dangerous job of underwater demolition.

The extent to which the demanding work John did for his country contributed to the loss of his leg is not made clear by the article. But two things are clear: The first is that, the Veterans' Administration must have sufficient funding to help veterans like John adjust to their disabilities. The second is that, regardless of whether or not his disability had any connection to his service, John would do it all over again.

Mr. President, a bumper sticker I see on cars an awful lot these days states that "America is No. 1 Because of its Veterans." People like John Chuchola are what makes that statement true.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article from the February 2 edition of Stars and Stripes be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

WHO IS JOHN CHUCHOLA?

(By Dan McCurry)

John Chuchola lives in Room W-6 at the Wilmington, Delaware VA Medical Center. Because his right leg is gone, this former Navy demolitions expert doesn't get around as much as he used to.

This year, however, John's face is a familiar sight in thousands of VA hospitals, veteran organizations, high schools, police and fire departments and city halls, around the country.

John is the veteran whose face looks back inspiringly from this year's VA poster for the February 14, National Salute to Hospitalized Veterans.

His likeness will appear on magazine and newspaper ads, billboards, and transit cards urging citizens to visit a VA hospital on Valentines Day.

A member of VFW Post 2863 in Wilmington, Chuchola served in the Navy from 1940 until 1963. Soon after enlistment, he reported to Norfolk, VA before a Naval Base even existed there. Then the government paid recruits to live in town.

With the coming of war, John participated in the invasion of North Africa, the North Sea and North Atlantic campaigns, and at Guadalcanal and the other island invasions in the South Pacific.

While hostilities ended for most military personnel with the signing of the Armistice, John's duty soon found him back in the thick of fighting as he helped move civilians from China who had been displaced by the civil war there.

In 1949, Chuchola volunteered for underwater demolition work where he cleared mines at Inchon, Korea prior to the U.S. landings there in the Korean War. For their work, his team received a Presidential Citation.

John lived at sea. He loved duty on the water but Naval prohibitions against excessive sea time soon drew him extended shore assignments.

Soon after retiring, John was admitted to the Wilmington VAMC with leg pains. When bypass surgery was unsuccessful, his right leg was amputated.

For a veteran whose limbs end at the elbow or knee cap, the memory of the cause of those injuries will never end. The legs of John Chuchola powered him through the water in the most dangerous of demolition work. Now he straps on an artificial limb each morning for hours of rigorous rehabilitation exercise.

John is one of the 45,000 amputees for whom the VA provided therapy last year. However learning to control his new leg is a bit more difficult than disarming the mines on the Inchon beach.

But John persevers. He isn't a quiter or one who will sit still for long. Since he never married—except to the sea—his only regular visitor is a sister.

On February 14 a visit to the Wilmington VAMC will find John wheeling down the hall to greet visitors. Now he is something of a celebrity. The National Salute to Veterans is designed to make the thousands of other Johns and Jills who are patients in VA hospitals also feel like celebrities for the day. They deserve it.

SCHOOL PRAYER

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I have spent 6 weeks engaged in negotiations with the majority leader directed toward crafting a spoken school prayer amendment that the leader and I could both accept and that two-thirds of the Senate would vote for. I entered those negotiations with an open mind. My purpose was to come up with a mechanism for protecting the rights of students who want to pray with the same vigor that we protect the rights of students who do not choose to pray.

Those negotiations began with the leader's preference of the amendment which was introduced a number of years ago by Senator Dirksen. I informed the leader that I preferred a silent prayer amendment, but that I would work with him to try to devise a spoken prayer amendment which I could sign onto and which would be acceptable to two-thirds of the Senate.

The majority leader and I agreed on a number of things from the start. First, we agreed that the right should be vested in the student. Second, we agreed that the Supreme Court and the lower courts that have followed the Supreme Court's decisions have gone too far in prohibiting any religious activity in the public schools.

And third, we agreed that the courts are wrong in their prohibition of any mention whatsoever of the Deity in the public schools.

From this starting point, we negotiated for weeks, sending drafts back and forth. The most recent exchange of drafts would have provided for separate facilities for the various religions and denominations, and for those who choose not to pray.

Short of agreement in this body on the type of spoken prayer amendment the majority leader and I were working on, I felt compelled to vote against the President's spoken prayer amendment. That amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 73, would allow a public schoolteacher to pick up the Koran, the Bible, or any other religious writing, and ask every student either to leave the room or to recite from that religious writing. The teacher could pick up any prayer, so long as it is not composed by a State authority, and could even pick up a prayer from the most extreme religious organizations.

This would create a situation where many schoolchildren would be confronted every day with religious teaching or religious activity that is contrary to the religious beliefs they are taught at home.

Mr. President, I believe that the Constitution does not prohibit recognition of the Deity in public school. I also believe that the Constitution does not prohibit beginning the schoolday with a moment of silence for prayer. Unfortunately, all across the Nation, school boards have been led to believe that these religious activities violate the establishment clause of the Constitution, even though, in my opinion, silent prayer and recognition of the Deity do not infringe upon the rights of religious minorities, nor do they exert a coercive influence on students.

I do not think silent prayer is a second-rate alternative to spoken school prayer. Indeed, I believe that silent prayer is at least as likely as spoken prayer to lead to a religiously meaningful moment during the schoolday. Instead of simply reciting the same prayer that everyone else is saying, silent prayer allows each student a private moment to pray in the way that is most consistent with his or her own religious beliefs, and is therefore most personally meaningful.

In addition, silent prayer will not make students feels coerced, embarrassed, or left out, even if their beliefs are different from those of their classmates.

Mr. President, there is no better way to express the special value of silent prayer than the words of Jesus at Matthew 6, verses 6-8:

When thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are. For they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily, I say unto you, they have their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut the door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly.

In the past 2 years, we have seen the development of a special urgency for a silent prayer constitutional amendment. Five Federal district courts have ruled on the constitutionality of silent prayer in the public schools, resulting in the striking down of silent prayer statutes in Alabama, New Jersey, Tennessee, and New Mexico. Each of those four statutes was found to constitute a violation of the establishment clause of the first amendment. Only in Massachusetts was a silent prayer statute upheld by a Federal court.

I believe that we need to pass a constitutional amendment to overrule those four Federal courts that have found silent prayer unconstitutional, and to stop this accelerating trend of the Federal courts toward a total exclusion of all religious activities from the public schools.

Some claim that since the Supreme Court has not ruled on silent prayer, we should not pass a constitutional amendment. But there is no way of knowing if the Supreme Court will ever rule on silent prayer. We should also recall that the Supreme Court had not ruled on the subject matter addressed by the Bill of Righ*s when those amendments were added to the Constitution.

Mr. President, I also strongly support the concept of "equal access" set forth in section two of the silent prayer amendment. That section would allow equal access to public school facilities for religious groups on the same basis as those facilities are made available for non-religious activities.

In 1981, the Supreme Court held, in Widmar against Vincent, that student groups at a State university are constitutionally entitled under the free speech clause of the first amendment to use university facilities for religious worship and discussion to the same extent as other groups are permitted to use those facilities. The Court found that the university's policy of prohibiting use of facilities for religious purposes constituted a content-based exclusion of religious speech, violating the "fundamental principle" that State regulation of speech should be "content-neutral."

The Court's decision, however, did not resolve whether students below the university level have a constitutional right to use public school facilities for religious purposes.

As in the case of silent prayer, in the past few years, the lower Federal courts have launched an assault on the right of students to meet on school property for religious meetings, with courts in Texas, New Jersey, and Oklahoma finding such meetings unconstitutional.

As those courts have interpreted the Constitution, groups of public school students are allowed to meet before or after school, on school property, for any purpose but a religious one. Students are not constitutionally prohibited from meeting to discuss business, politics, sex, moral or social philosophy, Freud, Marx, or Darwin. But if a group of high school students wants to meet to read and discuss the Bible, or the Koran, or to pray together, the courts have said that this is prohibited by the establishment clause of the Constitution.

In conclusion, Mr. President, students are being denied what I think should be their right to both silent prayer and access to school facilities for religious purposes. Since we cannot count on the Supreme Court to remedy the situation, it is our responsibility to do so.

NATIONAL CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, the month of April, designated as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month" has been set aside to focus national attention on the plight our children face in this era of rampant child maltreatment. According to the American Humane Association, reported cases of child abuse and neglect increased more than 120 percent nationwide between 1976-82.

Mr. President, I am heartened by this Chamber's growing awareness of the need to take positive steps to insure that our children are as safe as possible.

This is evident not only in our recognition that child abuse is a national tragedy but also in our willingness to confront other issues of importance to our children such as child pornography, child molestation, and missing children.

Last Friday, the Senate passed an amendment in the form of a substitute to H.R. 3635, a bill to amend Federal laws prohibiting the production or distribution of child pornography. Senator SPECTER and I for the Senate and Congressmen HUGHES and SAWYER for the House negotiated a substitute which retains those provisions of both bills providing for the toughest laws to stop the sexual exploitation and abuse of children.

In addition, on April 11, the Senate, through Senator SPECTER's Judiciary Subcommittee on Juvenile Justice, will examine bills that he and I introduced making available to child detention centers and child-oriented businesses the sexual assault, child molestation, and pornography arrest records of prospective and present employees whose work would bring them in regular contact with children.

We must not forget the Missing Children Assistance Act of 1983. This act would establish and maintain a national toll-free telephone line where individuals could report information regarding the location of missing children. My understanding is that this bill, which also reauthorizes the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974, has 55 cosponsors.

Lastly, as cosponsor of S. 1003, the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment and Adoption Reform Act Amendments of 1983, I urge the support of every Member in this body to assist in the passage of this important legislation. It is necessary to continue to fund and support programs assisting the States in combating child abuse in addition to the development of various programs facilitating the adoption of hard-to-place children in loving homes. Additionally, the inclusion of language to make the withholding of medical care an action of child abuse is significant in such cases brought to our attention as Baby Doe in Bloomington, Ind., and Baby Jane Doe in Stoneybrook, N.Y. Such incidents seem incompatible with a society which cherishes the sanctity of human life and the intrinsic worth of each individual. Our Nation's commitment to equal protection under the law will have little meaning if we deny such protection to those who have not been blessed with the same physical or mental gifts that we too often take for granted.

I believe that all of these measures represent important steps forward in safeguarding our Nation's children. They lend substance to our recognition that we must curb child abuse in America.

"A GIFT FROM MAINE"

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, a sixth-grade class in New Gloucester, Maine, and the Maine creative community recently collaborated on a noteworthy literary endeavor. The product of that collaboration, a book entitled "A Gift From Maine," contains original works by Maine artists and writers along with their thoughts on the creative process. The sixth-grade editors undertook the project of putting the book together under the guidance of Mr. James Plummer, a teacher at New Gloucester Memorial School.

Contributors to "A Gift From Maine" include E. B. White, Jamie Wyeth, Stephen King, Alan Magee, and other famous authors and artists. Mr. White, the author and former New Yorker editor, contributed an essay entitled "An Imaginary Maine Animal Story." Mr. Wyeth, son of the artist Andrew Wyeth, added to the book an original drawing of a "happy, laughing pig," as well as suggestions on how children could draw their favorite animals. Mr. King, a best-selling author of horror stories, wrote a piece for the book about growing up in Maine. Mr. Magee, well-known for his cartoons, drawings, and paintings, submitted a drawing of "Beach Stones."

The promotion of excellence is in large part accomplished through the praise of that which is worthy of emulation. I feel that the inspired methods of Mr. James Plummer and his efforts to motivate and stimulate creativity among his students are indeed worthy of praise and emulation. His dedication and success show that excellence in education is flourishing in Maine.

I ask unanimous consent that an article regarding the creation of this book, which appeared in the New York Times on February 9, 1984, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAINE SIXTH GRADERS PUBLISH ORIGINAL WORK BY THE FAMOUS

AUGUSTA, MAINE, February 18.—A sixth-grade English class project has become a book containing original work by E. B. White, Stephen King, Jamie Wyeth, Alan Magee and other famous authors and artists.

The children obtained the original works, with rights and royalties signed over to them for publication, by simply writing to the writers and artists to ask them to share their observations on the creative process.

"I wanted to develop something to spark creativity, show kids how to do something," said their teacher, James Plummer. "So we decided to write to the creative community in Maine. We figured they'd have good ideas."

"I was very impressed by the response of all those people," he said.

"A GIFT FROM MAINE"

Mr. Plummer had planned a mimeographed book, not the high-quality paperback Gannett Books of Portland decided to print. Called "A Gift From Maine," the 160-page book has a glossy color cover that displays a red-ribbon wrapped around a large white box covered with the autographs of the contributors.

"At the beginning, I didn't think it was so hot," admitted Leah Levasseur, 12 years old. "First we wrote letters to businesses—that was boring. Then we started writing to artists—that was fun."

When the creative urge hit, the children worked on the project outside the English class during recess and after school.

Receiving responses from the artists was everybody's favorite part of the project. Mr. Plummer said it was "like Christmas—every letter and package contained a gift," hence the book's title.

"It was fun to find out people would answer the letters you sent them," said Cheryl Slocum, 12. In their letters, students requested an "activity" from the writers and painters.

Mr. White, 84, the author, essayist and former New Yorker editor who lives in, Brooklin, Me., sent an essay.

"First he called," Mr. Plummer said. "He said he didn't know what an 'activity' was. I told him that was teacher-talk for something you could do with kids."

Mr. White's essay, called "An Imaginary Maine Animal Story," compares the creative process to a mosquito bite.

"When a mosquito bites me—I scratch," Mr. White wrote. "When I write something, I guess I'm trying to get rid of the itchiness inside me."

Mr. White went on to suggest what children could do if they wanted to nurture the writing instinct. He advised keeping a diary, and he told them he had a journal he had been keeping since boyhood that contained "millions of words."

FROM WYETH, A HAPPY PIG

Mr. Wyeth, a longtime Maine summer resident who is the son of the artist Andrew Wyeth, enclosed an original drawing of a "happy, laughing pig" and suggestions on how children could draw their favorite animals "with expression."

"We think it's his childhood pet pig, Den-Den," Mr. Plummer said.

Mr. King, the best-selling author, who lives in Bangor, did not send along a horror tale such as his well-known works "Dead Zone" or "The Shining." Instead he told about growing up in Maine.

Mr. Magee, whose cartoons and drawings have appeared in many national magazines and whose paintings have received national acclaim, enclosed a drawing of "Beach Stones."

The book, to be distributed this month in New England and later nationally, is priced at $12.95. Royalties will be held in trust for future projects by New Gloucester Memorial School students.

ARCHBISHOP IAKOVOS: CLERICAL STATESMAN

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am pleased to call the Senate's attention that Sunday marked a remarkable anniversary for a remarkable man: the gentle but commanding Archbishop Iakovos, who has now headed the Greek Orthodox Church in North and South America for a full quarter century. In ceremonies yesterday in the Cathedral of the Holy Trinity in New York, Archbishop Iakovos was duly honored for his far-reaching humanitarian and religious contribution. As the spiritual leader of some 2 million Greek Orthodox followers in this hemisphere for 25 years, the archbishop was awarded the "Grand Cross of Honor" by Greece's Ambassador to the United States on behalf of Greek President Karamanlis. But the presence at that ceremony of clergymen from the Catholic and Protestant churches, and from various churches of the Eastern Rite, attested to the 74-year-old archbishop's broader leadership role.

An elder statesman among clergymen from many faiths, Archbishop Iakovos has been a champion of ecumenism, working tirelessly to heal rifts among the churches of the Eastern Rite and to promote interfaith cooperation in the National and World Councils of Churches. His forceful and continuing advocacy of human rights around the world was underscored by the presence at yesterday's proceedings of former President Carter, whose own human rights policies had joined him with the archbishop in common purpose. Finally, one must also note that Archbishop Iakovos has been particularly sensitive and effective in promoting closer relations between the United States and the people of Greece and Cyprus, with whom we share fundamental values and interests in the international community.

Mr. President, such men as Archbishop Iakovos transcend the world of politics but, in so doing, they give those of us who struggle in that world both inspiration and greater hope as we continue in the search for peace.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

(Mr. GRASSLEY assumed the chair.)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUDMAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for morning business has now concluded.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL FOR FISCAL YEAR 1984 PUBLIC LAW 480 PROGRAM

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now resume consideration of the unfinished business, H.J. Res. 492, which the clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492) making an urgent supplemental appropriation for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1984, for the Department of Agriculture.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER), relating to levels of funds for El Salvador, in which there shall be a 2-hour debate.

AMENDMENT NO. 2876

(Purpose: To cap at 3 percent increased emergency aid to El Salvador exempting medical aid ($13.5 million) and food aid (14 million) for a total of $35.4 million in emergency aid)

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask for immediate consideration of amendment No. 2876.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER) proposes an amendment numbered 2876.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, strike everything from the beginning of line 4 through "$61,750,000", and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The additional amounts of $13,500,000 for medical aid, and $14,000,000 for food aid shall be appropriated for El Salvador, as well as an additional amount of $7,900,000 (3 percent of the regular fiscal year 1984 appropriation for El Salvador) to carry out the provisions of Section 503 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961".

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes; I am delighted to yield.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, it is my understanding there is a 2-hour time limit with the time to be equally divided; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KASTEN. And the Senator from Montana will be in charge of the time on his side and I will be in charge of the time on our side; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Chair and I thank the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, "El Salvador?" People ask, "What are we doing there?"

When they hear about it, people wonder if El Salvador is important to understand, wondering if it is something like Vietnam. People also question why the U.S. Government does not focus more attention on problems at home, and then people quickly shift their focus to problems of their own.

Today, the last day before primary elections in New York and Wisconsin, the Democratic candidates will be making their statements on El Salvador before tomorrow's elections. Senator HART says, "No" to military expenditures there, former Vice President Mondale says that is "naive," and Reverend Jackson describes the pain of the Salvadoran people. Senator HART, who could probably campaign best on El Salvador by voting on these amendments, so far has not made clear how his views on El Salvador fit in with U.S. Central American policy. Fritz Mondale so far has not made clear on how much military aid he believes is necessary for El Salvador and where the solution lies. President Reagan, after Lebanon, is emphasizing that more money for El Salvador will get us closer to his goal for a heavy American militarized El Salvadoran army and a cooperative U.S. Honduran military force in Honduras.

Somehow the Democratic Presidential candidates have not fully described the fact that the only goal in sight for the Reagan Central American policy is spending huge amounts of money in Central America pinpointing the tiny country of El Salvador. It is big money—over $1 billion so far with another $1 billion asked for—for snuffing out 10,000 insurgents in El Salvador. That is the centerpiece of President Reagan's Central American policy. It centers on 3½ years of vivid statements about the overwhelming threat that these few insurgents in their hit or miss guerrilla skirmishes will result in overthrowing their government which, by domino effect, will lead to overthrowing Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Texas, and the United States. Always mentioning how far it is between Laredo and New York City.

That is a policy that goes against the course of history because history will record the continued course of the people in Central America finding the way in each of their countries to share in the control and ownership of the land, business, and a piece of opportunity in order to live, to prosper, and to advance.

Who says so? First of all most Americans who have been there. Or in Guatemala. And most Americans who have never been there when they focus on Central America believe it makes sense to describe as I have that course of history where the people of those tiny countries will have their chance. It is only here in Washington, D.C., where there is a strong vocal constituency for the Reagan Central America policy. You will not find it in our homes throughout the country, nor in our schools, nor among our youth, nor in our churches, nor in the daily conversations in America's daily gathering points.

Our Latin American neighbors, particularly Mexico, Colombia, Panama, and Venezuela, say we err in promoting the continuing military buildup in El Salvador. The people in Guatemala who are exposed to similar problems of constant Army-insurgent armed skirmishes suffer as do their southern neighbors; 100,000 Guatemalans have fled northward into crowded refugee camps which are havens of safety in Mexico. History tells us the poor from small Central American countries will advance, and get their chance, but meanwhile, they and their families must survive.

So, returning to El Salvador who are we to believe? Are we to believe that either D'Aubuisson or Duarte as President will bring El Salvador forward into peace and justice? We can fully comprehend that either as President will want all the money—this and all of the $700 million more that President Reagan wants to send them over the next 1½ years. Are we to believe the church people who have been there or who are still there when they tell us that our arms movements will not solve but only prolong the problems of El Salvador? Should we believe our colleagues just returned from there who say that they saw on the faces and heard from the lips of the El Salvadoran people their desire for democracy and freedom of conflict? Are we to find favor with Senator INOUYE amendment, an amendment that was first proposed for $49 million and then compromised to $62 million? In making our judgment, we can believe some or all of the statements made in sincerity yet still recognize that our collective judgment should reflect a sound centerpiece for U.S. Central American policy.

I would like to return to the question of the church and their consensus recommendation. The American church people who visited El Salvador are appalled at the hopeless anxiety that continued armed conflict means for the poor. Their testament, that is people of the church, and particularly those of the Roman Catholic Church, make corrections for past silence on the injustice of the wealthy and military oppression of the poor. In the 1500's Roman Catholic priests accompanied Spanish conquistadors as they conquered and dominated the Mayans, the Aztecs, and other indigenous natives. Throughout the intervening centuries, it is only recently that the church has focused on the problems of majority of the people, that is the problems of the poor, and spoken out on behalf of the poor, for land reform, equity, education, and opportunity in government and business and the rights of all of the people of Central America.

So it is up to us to show in this particular amendment that we understand those rights and that money appropriated on behalf of U.S. taxpayers is for a solid progressive El Salvadoran policy and is part of a Central American policy for justice.

Ordinarily, with the $200 billion deficit, words of restraint on spending would come from Reagan's administration. In this instance, that is not the case. President Reagan is the chief architect and the loudest, most blatant, vocal advocate of all. And plunging forward with huge spending in this area. Where are the citizen taxpayers when we need them?

They say we are squandering too much money abroad and not paying attention to our problems here at home. Now is the time for those who assert that Congress appropriates too much money that is wasted in foreign aid, who assert it adds to the outrageous Federal deficits and positions both Congress and the country as being unduly concerned with events abroad while not giving Americans an even break on urgent problems here at home—now is the time for all of them to stand up and be counted.

They forcefully say that they would like a fair break for once on taxes, or hospital costs and medical charges for doctor's bills, getting a job or getting their job back, on education or job training, on veteran's matters and senior citizen problems—all of these problems here at home. They say they would like a fair break for once on trade. They say they want an even break on agriculture prices.

They say they are going broke and Washington doesn't seem to know or to care. The steelworkers, nonferrous metalworkers, the miners, and the millworkers ask us why it is easier to send money abroad than to face urgent problems unsolved in the United States and they add the country is in a hell of a mess. They ask why don't we act like Americans and fight here in Congress to let our own people have a chance.

There is a fellow who spoke out in the stockman's bar in Montana—never mind which town, there is a stockman's bar in Missoula and 22 other towns in Montana. This guy in the stockman's bar said "it is all those liberals in Congress who waste all their time and the country's money sending it to foreign countries you hardly ever heard of." While that fellow may label President Reagan, Defense Czar Cap Weinberger, Secretary of State Charles Schultz as liberals, he should know that I am not one of them and political labels do not necessarily fit.

Jesse Jackson is out campaigning to find what he calls his rainbow coalition; namely, a constituency ranging across all colors of skin. What I am looking for is a coalition of Americans whose color of only their necks can be figuratively described as ranging from red through all shades to the quiet gray that can be found in the quiet constraints of Vietnam veterans or those motivated by church or charity who believe we have a poor policy in El Salvador in relation to the goals and aspirations of the poor and quiet majority of Salvadorans.

How do American taxpayers believe we get to a $200 billion deficit? They should know that much of that deficit has been by items that are misspent and cost chunks of $40 or $62 million appropriations, like these incremental appropriations for El Salvador. President Reagan believes that a $62 million appropriation this week plus another $263 million during the year is vital for El Salvador this year. He gets chunks once, twice, or thrice a year always because it is an emergency of vital importance to the United States.

This despite words of caution expressed by Central American countries much closer to El Salvador than we are. The Contadora group of Mexico, Panama, Venezuela, and Colombia warn us that our intervention in the military internal warfare of this tiny country will likely fail and hinder or stalemate the progress of El Salvadoran people toward a stable reliable government.

They do not base their premise on denying food and medical aid, nor do I object to that type of aid for the El Salvadoran Government and its people.

They do not base their recommendations on violations of the Rio Treaty, nor do I. And finally I do not base my objections to this appropriation by ignoring the Monroe Doctrine.

Rather, I adhere to both the Monroe Doctrine and the Rio Treaty. We can and should deal directly with Cuba on peace in the Americas. But the United States should state unequivocally by diplomatic warnings to Cuba and Russia or others that through surveillance at the shores and in the air and on the seas, we shall attempt with vigor to identify, intercept, dissuade and prevent any arms shipments into Central America, including El Salvador. Preventing intervention of arms shipments into El Salvador is our business, it is consistent with Latin American treaties and is alined with the Contadora declaration and the Organization of American States.

Individual Americans immersed in their own problems tend to focus their attention on foreign involvements only long enough to forcefully protest and then leave it to others, principally Congress, to register those protests while they themselves lapse back into their own problems at home and let slide the opportunity to change the policies of our country's foreign affairs and suffer along with the urgent problems they face at home. But let us focus for a few moments on what our policies are in El Salvador.

What, when, and where are the three points in a news story to get in the lead sentence. The story of this deal is that the what—$93 million is cut to $62 million—that is the what—when is now and the where is El Salvador.

That story will not dominate many coffeebreaks or be the No. 1 topic at the country's dinner tables or neighborhood bars today throughout America.

But it ought to be.

It ought to be the No. 1 topic for American citizens who finally figure out they are being had. Maybe $62 million is too small an amount to register compared to the Nation's massive $200 billion deficits.

Well, many Americans are wondering why we send more money.

In 1979 $10 million was appropriated, $73.3 million in 1980, $141.1 million in 1981, $274 million in 1982, $326.8 million in 1983, $576.1 million requested for 1984. That is a total of $1.4 billion and will increase to $2 billion if all of President Reagan's El Salvador funds are approved in the next 6 months.

As of right now, $160 million already appropriated for 1984 for El Salvador has not been spent. In military aid $19 million cannot be spent until there is a verdict in the trial of the individuals charged with killing the American nuns.

Ninety-five million dollars in money for roads, airstrips, barracks, et cetera, or buying weapons has not been spent. Five million dollars for food is still unspent, and $40 million for development is still waiting to be spent by El Salvador. They will have a hard time using all of that before October 1.

Maybe the remote location of tiny El Salvador with only 4 million people causes people to sign off by saying "what's going on there? Where did you say it was?"

El Salvador is south—south of our South—the Carolinas, Alabama, Georgia, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana with their agriculture producers scrambling to survive and their industrial plants struggling for recovery. It is south of Texas with its drought areas and frost-blighted areas and unemployed workers.

El Salvador is south of our neighbor, Mexico, with its economy under severe stress but providing food, shelter, and medicine in camps in their border state of Chiapas for 100,000 refugees who have in fear fled Guatemala. El Salvador is south of Guatemala, another country that has its army fighting rebels in guerrilla warfare for a generation as the poor struggle for food and economic survival.

Guatemala's class struggle is similar to El Salvador. The wealthy and military have for generations dominated the country and the poor. In both of these countries the overwhelming majority of people are the poor. In both of these countries the overwhelming majority of people are the poor with incomes of little more than $200 per year.

Yes, El Salvador is south of all this and like Guatemala, like Nicaragua, is a country with its countryside afflicted with scattered guerrilla fighting of the dissatisfied attempting to better the lot of the poorer disadvantaged people. Some define the dissatisfaction in Guatemala or El Salvador as Communist insurgents and some describe the dissatisfied in Nicaragua as anti-Communist insurgents.

What does another $62 million for El Salvador mean to us?

Listen to the reasoning for the massive 4-year buildup of foreign aid to El Salvador.

Secretary of State Alexander Haig said in 1981 that additional funds, above what had been requested in the budget, were needed because:

> A white paper issued by the State Department documented that the Communist insurgents have been organized by Cuba and supplied with arms by it and other Soviet-bloc nations.

In 1982, Assistant Secretary of State Enders argued that Congress must provide additional funds to El Salvador, again over what was approved in the budget saying:

> Without the assistance we have requested, continuing progress (in El Salvador) * * * will be difficult if not impossible * * * and we cannot expect the killing to end * * *.

In the same year yet another supplemental was requested for El Salvador by the Secretary of State, who assured Congress that "delay until 1983 would give the insurgents more opportunity to undermine the progress represented by the 1982 elections."

President Reagan pressured Congress to provide these supplemental funds saying that El Salvador's economy was in desperate straits. No wonder. They are always fighting.

Even though economic and military aid to El Salvador continued to increase through the regular budget process in 1983, supplemental military assistance was again provided when President Reagan declared an unforeseen emergency and sent military supplies from his defense drawdown stockpile of military assistance. In taking this action, he said that failure to provide additional military support "at this point would, in our judgment, be to abandon El Salvador."

Four months later the administration requested further emergency military aid for El Salvador. President Reagan, in his April 27, 1983, speech to a joint session of Congress explained that the aid responded to Communist aggression in the Western Hemisphere:

> Cuba is host to a Soviet combat brigade, a submarine base capable of servicing Soviet submarines, and military air bases visited regularly by Soviet military aircraft * * * Must we just accept the destabilization of an entire region from the Panama Canal to Mexico on our southern border?

He concluded saying that "the national security of all the Americas is at stake in Central America."

Secretary of State Shultz, in further support of additional aid for 1984, said that with the activity of the guerrillas increasing and the level of their outside support also increasing, there was a "sense of stagnation in the military situation in particular" that justified additional military aid.

The requests for increased military and economic aid for El Salvador for 1985 were part of the proposal of $8.5 billion for Central America to carry out the Kissinger Commission's report. President Reagan has called the Kissinger report "magnificent," "we are really behind it," and that:

> You can't have social reforms while you're having your head shot off by guerrilla forces that are armed and supported by the Soviet Union and Cuba.

There are almost 10,000 Salvadoran insurgents who are mostly armed with captured weapons that we supplied to the Salvadoran military.

Those are captured weapons that we supplied to the Salvadoran military, the Salvadoran Government's Army.

How much does it cost to kill one of these guerrillas? If you just take the entire budget, you would have to think that it takes, in 1984, $26,000 per guerrilla. That is for this year. Of course, we will not kill them all this year. So in order to meet that emergency, President Reagan's budget has more in it for next year.

He suggests in his budget $700 million—that breaks down to about $70,000 to kill each guerrilla next year. That is expensive killing.

The hundreds of millions for El Salvador add up to billions and the budget deficits here at home get larger, interest rates get higher, the economy starts to slow, and we talk a lot about the need to cut spending. We can start to cut spending right here today by limiting the military aid to El Salvador.

All Americans should know how U.S. aid in El Salvador is being squandered.

First, of the $263.4 million already appropriated for 1984, $160.5 million still has not been spent and is available for El Salvador during the next 6 months.

Another $62 million would make the amount available $225 million. They will have a hard time spending it all in that small country.

Second, all Americans should know that countries closer than we are to El Salvador do not view the military power of 10,000 Salvadoran guerrillas as a military threat to them. Mexico and Panama recognize the threat of continued warfare there as being an internal dispute contrary to the goal of a stable government. They recommend to the United States that we recognize that fact and act accordingly to keep armaments out of El Salvador and allow the internal disputes to die down.

Third, armaments from the United States are being used by both sides in El Salvador. That is inevitable. The insurgents capture arms and ammunition from the army in skirmishes.

In those skirmishes, the insurgents capture arms and ammunition from the army. We do not know outside of those skirmishes how the insurgents may also get armaments from the army. But, of course, buying them is one opportunity. Who of the insurgents would say that the Salvadoran Army is so pure that it never occurs to them to sell armaments to their enemy. In the end, we are supplying both the army and the insurgents with their weapons and ammunition.

Fourth, D'Aubuisson calls rich El Salvadorian refugees in America and tells them he will delay further land reform and that they can come back and assume their property. This was before the elections. Duarte—called a Communist by D'Aubuisson—is going to also milk the United States for all the money he can.

That is a point that cannot be missed. That is how you make good as the President of such a tiny country.

Fifth, the American people ought to recognize that the approval of the $62 million will only be a downpayment on what President Reagan hopes will be a total of $700 million for the next 18 months.

Sixth, before Americans throw up their hands in frustration, let them focus on this point—the means and methods of controlling arms shipments to El Salvador from Cuba or Russia is not addressed in these bailouts to El Salvador's Army in fighting the 10,000 insurgents.

We can and should pressure Cuba, as I have stated earlier, to back peace in Central America. We can stop Cuba and Russia from building up military threats to that country and region by clear unmistakable diplomatic pressure, surveillance, detection, and interdiction of any such shipments. The present U.S. policy developed by President Reagan picks out El Salvador as a gruesome battle area to demonstrate U.S. military armaments capability in a very prolonged internal struggle of the poor to adjust that country's goals to change a society controlled by the rich and the army. While that struggle goes on, both sides will use those arms to fight as long as we supply them. This is a very small country and does not manufacture weapons. They get them from abroad—specifically in quantity from the United States.

Seventh, for all Americans who believe we ignore their problems at home, let me state, they are correct and $62 million more for El Salvador does add to those domestic problems because it will come out of funds that otherwise might alleviate their burdens. Further, it is squandering tax dollars for purposes that have no good goal for the United States and further leads to squandering of hundreds of millions of dollars more in El Salvador in the future, if we permit it to be the case.

To blunt this policy, I offer an amendment to restrict these funds to a 3-percent cap above the funds already voted for El Salvador this year with exceptions for both food aid and medical aid. The 3-percent cap sets a limit at $7.9 million. Food aid in my amendment amounts to $14 million and medical aid amounts to $13.5 million, as in Senator INOUYE's amendment. The total comes to $35.4 million. There is no better time to show some restraint in spending and restraint in armaments in El Salvador in order to correct a false and dangerous policy for that country and for all of Central America. All of the litany of President Reagan and his administration in justifying increasing armament support for El Salvador is based on snuffing out 10,000 insurgents. Those insurgents are armed with the armaments we sent to the El Salvadoran Army.

The President is wrong on El Salvador and I challenge his understanding of the people there and in Central America. I challenge his accuracy. I challenge President Reagan to review and corroborate his assessment of El Salvador and Central America with other Central American countries. The people of those countries have for generations and with justification feared the oppression of their government's armed forces. Ask Mexico and the other members of the Contadora group. I say to President Reagan; ask the refugees of Guatemala.

I call on President Reagan to reassess the events in Nicaragua, where the people overthrew the military might of Somoza, to reassess why Costa Rica has no army at all, and to assess the military upheaval occurring in Honduras even during the past several days.

I challenge a policy built on a centerpiece of military armaments for El Salvador. Restraint on armaments for Central America has to be the centerpiece for a good U.S. policy. My amendment does that.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. EAST. Mr. President, I appreciate the opportunity to speak for a brief period of time on this amendment proposed by the very able Senator from Montana. I simply wish to emphasize a few points lest we keep retracing old ground here, which may very well occur as we continue to face one amendment after another.

First, I know it is not the intention of the gentlemen offering the amendments on the El Salvador question; I do not question their motivation or their integrity, nor the incisiveness of their arguments; but I think we need to note the effect of this heavy barrage of amendments that we are being faced with over the next few days. I am not suggesting that is the motivation, but the effect of it is to stall any quick action on this particular measure that we have very broad bipartisan support for.

The further effect, of course, is to try to whittle away at this broad bipartisan support. I think that is, again, with all due respect to those offering amendments, unfortunate. I frankly preferred the larger figure that the President originally proposed in the $90 million range. Senator INOUYE, in the great spirit of trying to build a bipartisan coalition, proposed $62 million.

That figure has been broken down and there is obvious broad bipartisan support for it as shown on earlier amendments and votes on earlier amendments. What we continue to see emerging here, I presume, today and for the balance of the week, is a continual barrage of amendments that will have the effect of, one, stalling the giving of aid and, two, whittling away whatever with a little imagination one might dream up to whittle away.

I appreciate that these Senators are honorable in their intentions and they have every right to offer amendments under the rule of the Senate and are proceeding to do so, so we accept those as the realities of life and must proceed to respond to their individual amendments, I think with the best-reasoned arguments we can.

First, again I would like to underscore as heartily as I can that there is broad bipartisan support for the measures that currently exist that developed out of the very effective cooperation between the distinguished Senator from Hawaii and the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. If I am not in error, I note in this report and if I am in error, I stand to be corrected, the very distinguished minority leader of this body is supporting that. I might note—and again, I shall be happy to stand corrected if I am in error—that the majority leader of the House of Representatives, the distinguished Representative from Texas, Mr. JAMES WRIGHT, is supporting it. So it is not one of partisan interest. It is of broad bipartisan interest.

Everyone will have to give on this. Those who supported the position I took gave, gave up a third. I know Senator KASTEN preferred the larger figure and he gave up a third. It is always difficult to work out compromises, but in this case, we do have broad bipartisan support. I think that is a healthy development and I would like to underscore that, that this is not a narrow partisan matter.

My quarrel, if you will, or disagreement with the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Montana is that the effect of it would be to gut any real genuine military assistance to the Army of El Salvador. To me, that would be a great tragedy. What we have seen in El Salvador in the past week is an outpouring of support for this election, the beginning of a viable democracy, and whatever weaknesses Mr. Duarte may have or Mr. D'Aubuisson may have, at least they have shown a willingness to participate in the democratic process. That is more than one can say about the insurgents, who are hoping to shoot their way into power as an armed ideology, backed by Nicaragua, Cuba, and the Soviet Union.

Mr. Duarte made a statement that I read over the weekend in which he said, "If we do not get this aid, we are going to lose this conflict, this fledgling democracy, to the Communist-Marxist-Leninist totalitarian guerrilla forces." I remind the distinguished Senator from Montana that Mr. Duarte led heavily in the election, is likely to be the next President of El Salvador, and is a man whom, by any standards, we would identify as having a center-to-left position on the American political scale and also that of Central America and South America.

He himself is saying that if they do not receive this aid to support the army, the Communists will simply win a victory.

What we will have allowed to happen—the United States, the leader of the Free World, in our own hemisphere—we would have allowed the armed ideology of communism, the Marxist-Leninist guerrillas who have refused to participate in the democratic process, again backed by the Sandinista Marxist-Leninist regime of Nicaragua, backed by Fidel Castro of Cuba, backed by Moscow and the Governments of Eastern Europe and, I might note, the PLO—Soviet proxies—to, in effect, gun their way into power in Central America.

As Mao Tse-tung put it one time, "Political power comes out of the barrel of a gun." That is precisely what is occurring in Central America.

Now, I have noted before on the Senate floor, going back to the Monroe Doctrine of 1823—which incidentally James Monroe was a part of the lineage of the distinguished contemporary Democratic Party; the Jeffersonian Republican Party of that era, of course, is the earlier ancestry of the contemporary Democratic Party—it was the Monroe Doctrine of 1823 that there has been broad bipartisan support for ever since that time. The effect of the Monroe Doctrine was that we would not accept in this New-World-Old-World dominance, military presence, or control; foreign intervention and military presence of Old World power; that we intended to see our own kind of system the best we could; and that our spheres of influence would be preserved.

What is currently going on in Central America because of the Soviet, Cuban, and Nicaraguan connection is clearly a total de facto repudiation of the Monroe Doctrine. I think that is tragic. Again, I repeat, it came from the man known as the Father of the Constitution and it came from a man who was a part of the Jeffersonian Republican Party tradition, of which the distinguished Senator from Montana is a part, which again shows bipartisan support.

With all due respect to those who oppose continued aid to El Salvador, some seem to prefer it in no form at all, some seem to prefer it in a form which this amendment does without the military dimension. But as Mr. Kissinger has pointed out in the Kissinger Commission report—and I would submit commonsense would point it out—you cannot build a viable democracy and progressive reform unless you have the military shield behind which you can do it, because you are faced with the armed ideology of the insurgents again backed by Nicaragua, Cuba, and the Soviet Union.

You cannot stop armed violence just through wishful thinking and good will. What good does it do to send food assistance or medical assistance or other moneys that might be used to help build a viable and progressive and democratic society in El Salvador when you do not provide the military assistance to the army of that Government to withstand the onslaught of those who will not even participate in the democratic processes? I think it puts us in a very awkward position. And I tell you what kind of policy it is. It is a policy of isolationism, of simply washing our hands in any serious way of military developments in Central America. There is nothing new about it. There is nothing progressive about it. It is old. It is reactionary. It is the isolationism of the 1930's, and it is totally out of character with the whole broad, bipartisan foreign policy that this country has shown in Central America going back to the Monroe Doctrine of 1823, the firm actions that Theodore Roosevelt took as a Republican in the early part of this century, or Woodrow Wilson took as a Democratic President in the early part of this century. It is at odds with the Good Neighbor Policy of Franklin Roosevelt, or the Alliance for Progress of John Kennedy; it is at odds with the action that Democratic President Lyndon Johnson took in the Dominican Republic in 1964, and Republican Ronald Reagan took in Grenada last year.

We need to assert our influence and our power in this part of the world and, when confronted militarily, we must have a military response. That is elementary; it is commonsensical. To ignore that is simply to allow political power to come out of the barrel of a gun. If that is going to be America's policy in Central America, Africa, Asia, and the Middle East, I fear for our own security and future in terms of being able to maintain a democratic society in this country let alone those of our allies.

Probably my time grows short. I should like to conclude on what I thought was a very perceptive remark made the other day in this debate by the most able Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), a distinguished trial lawyer, one of the most eloquent speakers in this Chamber, and one of the most decisive thinkers in this Chamber. He was making what I think is a very perceptive, incisive remark the other day that I had not heard, seen, or read anywhere else. He said that if we do not grant this aid promptly and effectively, we may very well communicate the message to the people of El Salvador that some way or other we disapprove of Mr. Duarte.

I do not mean to quote the distinguished Senator. I may slightly misquote him, and if I do I will again be delighted to have him correct me, but his point was we would not want to communicate the message that we are now withholding support because some way or other we find Mr. Duarte unacceptable. I guess the implication would be we prefer D'Aubuisson, which I know the distinguished Senator from Montana does not and apparently the plurality of the people of El Salvador do not.

Mr. Duarte led and led substantially, and he is a man, in terms of the political spectrum, of the moderate left democratic socialist tradition. Why would we want to telegraph the message to his people and to him and to the people of El Salvador that we do not approve of that?

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. EAST. Just allow me to finish, please, and then I will.

The effect of this would be, as a practical matter of American foreign policy, we do not really care about democracy in Central America. And if the Communists shoot their way into power, so be it; we wash our hands of it.

Now, I know that is not the intention of the Senator from Montana or any other Senator in this body, but I find that morally repugnant. It is no policy. I think what you are going to continue to witness in Central America, whether one likes to admit it or not, one by one these regimes are going to fall under Communist domination, again, through the Nicaraguan and the Havana and the Moscow connection. It is Nicaragua now, then El Salvador, then Honduras, then Guatemala. I simply say at some point, gentlemen, you are turning the Caribbean into a major influence in terms of Soviet military power in the New World, in total violation of the Monroe Doctrine and, perhaps even more importantly, in total violation of what is morally acceptable, at least as I see it. To allow the Caribbean area and the Central American area to fall under the control of the Soviet Union is going to be a great disaster not only to democracy, but it is going to be a great disaster ultimately to the well-being and the security of our institution and tradition of democracy in this New World.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 15 minutes yielded the Senator has expired.

Mr. EAST. I again thank the Chair and I again thank the distinguished managers of this bill for allowing me the few minutes to respond to what I think is a negative amendment. I hope that the bipartisan support will reject it when the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the floor manager yield time to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina so that he can answer my question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I am pleased to yield to the Senator 3 additional minutes.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator on our side yield us 10 minutes on the bill so that the distinguished Senator may answer some questions?

Mr. INOUYE. I believe you are managing on your side?

Mr. MELCHER. On the bill?

Mr. INOUYE. It is up to you.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The total time on the bill is 8 hours. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KASTEN. So I take it that the Senator, as acting manager for his side, would be able to do that.

I think we can assume control of 4 hours on the bill on this side, so you would be in the position of allowing that time from your 4 hours on the bill.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes from the bill plus the 3 minutes that have been yielded by the distinguished floor manager on the other side, for a question of the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is yielding time from the bill.

Does the Senator from Wisconsin now wish to rescind his yielding of 3 minutes from his side on this amendment, or does he wish to let it stand?

Mr. KASTEN. I will let it stand. The point we are trying to make is that he now has 3 minutes from our time on this amendment, and he has the additional time the Senator from Montana is yielding from the opposition time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Chair, and I thank the distinguished floor manager of the bill.

Will the junior Senator from North Carolina yield for this question?

First, is he aware of the unspent money already appropriated for El Salvador?

Mr. EAST. Senator, I presume there are moneys that are currently available, that are in the pipeline, moving, and one can argue over the particular figures, I suppose, endlessly.

I saw the other day that the administration said it would be $400 million over a several-year period.

So I think that whatever particular figures we might select for debate or argument or whatever, it still brings me back to the fundamental point that the effect of the Senator's amendment would be to eliminate, for all practical purposes, any serious continued, near term—and I suppose it would reflect a long term—position of military assistance to the Government of El Salvador. I strongly dissent from that.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senator for his explanation.

There is $160 million already appropriated, not counting this proposed $62 million. That has already been appropriated in the 1984 bill for El Salvador, $19 million is held up, but the other $141 million is still waiting for them to spend in the coming 6 months.

I ask the distinguished Senator from North Carolina if he thinks that if President Duarte is the final victor in this election for President in El Salvador, President Duarte is going to campaign between now and the final election day—assuming he is successful after that—that he is going to campaign for less money from the United States? Does the distinguished Senator really believe that Duarte, as a candidate for President, and if elected President, would say to the United States—to President Reagan, in effect, and to Congress—"Please don't send us so much money"?

Mr. EAST. Let us assume that Duarte is elected President. I think that the Duarte government, for an indefinite period of time, is going to need American military assistance, as well as medical assistance and economic assistance, just as—if I might use a comparison—the Israeli people and the country of Israel and the Middle East will continue to need American military support as well as other forms.

Mr. MELCHER. Precisely. I thank the Senator for his answer, because that is the point. They are going to ask us for more as much as they can get.

I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he really believes that, somehow, we are not sending armaments to both sides. Does it not end up and does not the Senator believe that, as reported, many of these armaments end up with the insurgents.

Mr. EAST. I noticed, I believe, on "Meet the Press" yesterday, and I have read an analysis of it, that this figure is not correct.

Mr. MELCHER. What figure are you referring to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks Senators to address the Chair.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I inquire of the distinguished Senator, what figure?

Mr. EAST. The figure I say was about 7 percent that was in a particular locale. But the Senator smiles. Let me put it in broader perspective.

I read an interesting column by Milton Condracky, a man of the "liberal to moderate" point of view, who is executive editor of the New Republic, who said in the paper the other day that the U.S. Congress is not equipped to micromanage American foreign policy. I think he is correct.

All I am saying to the distinguished Senator from Montana is this: You can get witnesses in here who are saying they are getting a large number of arms. They will get witnesses in who say they are not. I do not know. You and I could go on and on endlessly about it.

Is it 7 percent? Is it more? If it is more, where are they getting them from? Some say they are getting them from the open market that came out of the American collapse in Vietnam, because Congress undercut the President's efforts there, in my judgment.

In any case, I think that what one must acknowledge is that the practical effect of this niggling—and I call it niggling—is to get to the point that people do not really want to give the aid that is adequate.

One can say the same about aid given to Israel, but we are going to defend Israel, and we should defend Israel against the Syrians——

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

Mr. EAST. As proxy of the Soviet Union in the Middle East.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has the floor.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I want to point up this part of the statement by saying that, yes, President Monroe was a Democrat; yes, President Jefferson was a Democrat. And they were both very great Americans, and they both started this country on the right course.

As to the Monroe Doctrine, there was nothing in the Monroe Doctrine that said we should send armaments to El Salvador or any other South American country. The Monroe Doctrine is specifically what I pointed out in my earlier remarks that provides us authority to intervene, to prevent, to interdict shipments of arms into another country for the purpose of disturbing the peace there and for threatening the peace in this hemisphere.

The Senator from North Carolina perhaps did not hear my remarks. If he will read them in the RECORD, or I am glad to supply him a copy, he will find we make that very clear.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a series of questions?

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for the purpose of asking some questions.

Mr. KENNEDY. First of all, I congratulate the Senator from Montana for this amendment that he has proposed and particularly for continuing the debate and discussion on Central American policy.

Some Members have said that those of us who sought to get this body to debate this issue were rather naive in their belief that other Members of this body did not really understand Central American policy. I think the wording that was used was "myopic."

I welcome the fact that the Senator from Montana, in his exchange with the Senator from North Carolina, has discussed in detail the specific amounts of money involved. As he correctly pointed out in this recent exchange, $19 million of the funds already appropriated have been fenced off, but would be available virtually overnight to the El Salvadoran Government if there were a verdict in the trail of those charged with the murder of the four American churchwomen who were brutally raped and then shot in 1980. It is important that that matter again be brought before the Senate. I wish to question the Senator from Montana about his specific amendment.

I have been here since the early part of his presentation. There are a number of features of the amendment which I think are particularly deserving and commend themselves to favorable action by the Senate this afternoon.

First of all, as I understand the Melcher amendment, it is an amendment for an appropriation of some $35.4 million as compared to the $61.75 million that has been tentatively agreed to in this legislation.

Am I correct?

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. If this amendment were accepted, the funds would be available through this fiscal year, that is, to the end of September 30. Included in the Senator's amendment is a recommendation that the military aid portion be equal to what it was provided last year with a 3-percent growth. Am I correct on that?

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator is correct, and 3 percent is in line with so many other caps we are talking about for other programs.

Mr. KENNEDY. So the amount of military assistance that the Senator is talking about, as I calculate it, would come to about $7.9 million?

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. For the reasons that the Senator from Montana has outlined, the amendment limits the vote of growth in military assistance to the same limit placed on domestic programs.

I also wish to draw attention to those funds that could be used for a variety of different functions—ammunition, training, trucks, and helicopters, ground maneuver forces, communications sustainment, and the various other military programs which have been identified by the administration. We should note a special feature of the amendment of the Senator from Montana—it provides the full $13.5 million requested in medical aid and assistance. This represents a very modest increase over what was actually accepted as the compromise amendment. Is my understanding correct that there would be a modest increase in medical aid even over the amount in the tentatively agreed amendment?

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator is correct. It is a little over $1 million more than what would be available for medical purposes under the Inouye amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Montana also has included in his amendment $14 million for food aid and assistance which has not been included in the compromise amendment which has been tentatively agreed. Am I correct in that as well?

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. I am strongly committed to help and assist the thousands of displaced persons in El Salvador. I will address that issue shortly, perhaps even this afternoon. We need to focus additional attention on their critical needs. I imagine that the funds contained in the amendment of the Senator from Montana would be distributed through various church agencies and other nonprofit groups, to prevent as much as possible what is called "seepage." That word of art is used to describe the actions of many in El Salvador who misuse American aid and assistance, whether it is humanitarian aid and assistance or military aid and assistance, for their own personal gains, such as sales on the black market. This particular amendment, contains food aid and assistance which is not contained in the compromise amendment.

It is useful for the Members to have outlined for them the contents of the Melcher amendment because I think its stress and emphasis on humanitarian help and assistance are important. It is also important to recognize it provides for the continuation of military aid at approximately last year's level with a small measure of increase in terms of inflation.

I intend to support that amendment. The principal difference, I believe, between the Senator from Montana and myself is that I wish to await the outcome of the runoff election itself before committing over a longer period of time either military and humanitarian assistance. I welcome the Senator's strong emphasis and insistence on humanitarian aid. I do think it is important to support this amendment.

Finally, I wish to review with the Senator from Montana the various other authorities available to the President to provide emergency assistance, military assistance, which have been touched on only lightly during the course of this debate. I wish to know whether the Senator from Montana would not agree with me that there does exist, even at the present time, very substantial funding that would be available should the President want to make it available within his own power if there were some very dire emergency? Would the Senator not agree with me on that issue?

I do not want to trespass on his time, but I will have an opportunity either now or later when I offer my amendment to review those programs for the Senate.

But I think it is important that since the Senator has referred to it we underline that particular fact.

(Mr. DANFORTH assumed the chair.)

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Massachusetts has added more and more to what is available to President Reagan to spend there as he so desires. It is up to the El Salvadorans to make the request for the $160 million that has been appropriated and is still waiting anxiously. I would suppose, in the State Department's coffers. It will come out of the Treasury and out of the taxpayers' pockets, to go down to El Salvador.

But the Senator is absolutely correct. The President has $250 million in contingency funds that he can send down there in armaments. That is a quarter of a billion bucks.

Mr. KENNEDY. I imagine the Senator from Montana is referring to section 506(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act which permits the President in the interests of national security to draw down from Defense Department stocks. It is my understanding that the President has approximately $75 million available to him from this source and has relied on this authority at least twice in the past to provide emergency assistance to El Salvador.

Mr. MELCHER. Has the President drawn down on that particular fund yet?

Mr. KENNEDY. There have been two occasions. One occurred when the Ilopango airfield was bombed in El Salvador in 1982. The other occurred when President Reagan requested emergency authority to draw down defense stocks during fiscal year 1981.

But at least that authority is available. There is also section 614 of the Foreign Assistance Act which also permits the President to use up, as the Senator has mentioned, to $250 million once he determined such expenditures were in the national security interests or in the interest of the United States. He could also rely on section 21(d) of the Arms Export Control Act which provides an authority to send whatever is needed on an emergency basis by the military in El Salvador. Under that legislation, the President merely defers the billing date for repayment for 120 days and relies on excess military stocks to tide El Salvador through the emergency, if such an emergency really does exist. After 60 days, under this legislation, the President submits a finding to the Congress that his use of this authority was, in fact, required by our national security interests and requests Congress to authorize and appropriate the amount needed to pay for the material drawn down earlier to meet the emergency.

So there are those provisions. I would dare say, Mr. President, that I believe that this whole supplemental request, and the skirting of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, was basically motivated by the fact that the administration believed that there was a real possibility that Mr. D'Aubuisson would receive a strong vote in the initial election and perhaps be successful in the final runoff. I believe the administration wanted to make sure that there was enough resources and moneys, both in the pipeline and actually appropriated by the Congress, so that we would not be able to have the kind of voice on future levels of assistance and help. Such a voice is essential if we are going to insure that the murder of the four American churchwomen is going to be accounted for, the murder of the two labor advisers is going to be accounted for, that there will be a termination of death squad activity, and there would be a real movement toward an end to violence and beginning of a process of negotiation.

The Senator is quite correct in pointing out the funding which is available. It is quite appropriate to wonder why the administration is rushing us to appropriate millions of additional dollars more of military assistance.

I thank the Senator from Montana for his response. I believe that he has helped very much in this discussion and debate on the American policy in El Salvador.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I point out that all of these unspent moneys already appropriated to El Salvador, plus the President's contingency fund in various forms, add up to a half billion dollars being available for El Salvador over the next 6 months, if we never appropriated them another nickel.

The point is that here we have been goaded on by claims of urgency, by claims of vital need, by the claims that crop up in these urgent supplementals every time for El Salvador, and they have never gotten to the bottom of the well. We are continually adding depth to that well. And the funds are there. They have never run out.

There is too much that has been appropriated to them; there is too much available. I am not sure why we are addressing this in an urgent supplemental.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. President.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, first of all, how much time is available on the Melcher amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty minutes to the Senator from Wisconsin and 30 minutes and 15 seconds to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. KASTEN. So then we assume that the discussion that we have just had between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Montana was in fact time off the bill, not time off the amendment; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I would like to respond to a couple of the comments that have been made here, I hope to put the overall question in a more definitive context.

We began with an administration request of $93 million in emergency military aid for El Salvador. That aid was basically in four components. Component No. 1 was military aid in the amount of $49 million. The second component was medical assistance, approximately $12½ million. The third component was mobility, approximately $29 million. And the fourth component was communications equipment, which was roughly $4 million. That added up to $93 million.

We then, working with the Senator from Hawaii and members of the administration, made a compromise. As I suggested when I agreed to that compromise, I felt that the entire $93 million was needed, and I felt that we had the votes to pass that on the floor of the Senate. But in the interest of demonstrating the kind of bipartisan support shown by the Kissinger commission and in the interest of working with the ranking minority member on the Foreign Operations Appropriations Subcommittee, I worked for and am now supporting the Inouye compromise.

The difference between the administration request and the Inouye compromise is essentially the mobility component. In other words, we are talking here about military aid in the neighborhood of $49 million. The medical assistance is the same as the administration's request, $12.5 million. We dropped the $29 million in mobility, and we have a small amount of money in communications equipment; effectively the new communications equipment has also been dropped. The total figure of the Inouye compromise is roughly $62 million.

Now a third amendment has come before us. I think it is important to recognize how that fits with what has already been adopted. This third amendment is for a total of approximately $35 million. But the components are significantly different than either the Inouye amendment or the initial administration request.

Where both Inouye and the administration request had $49 million for military assistance, the Melcher request comes at just under $8 million. That is the area that is most urgently needed. That is the critical part. A difference of $49 million compared to $8 million.

The Melcher amendment picks up the medical component. So Melcher would agree with the administration and with Inouye on medical funding, roughly $13 million.

Mobility is cut out in both the Inouye and Melcher amendments. Communications equipment is out in both the Inouye and Melcher amendments. Then, in order to make up the difference, we add $14 million in Public Law 480 funds to make the total of $35 million. Well, we do not need the Public Law 480 emergency food assistance. That is not requested by the administration. So the effect of the Melcher amendment is not just a difference between $49 and $35 million——

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KASTEN. I will yield after I have completed this analysis.

Mr. MELCHER. This is a very pertinent point, because it is requested in the President's request.

Mr. KASTEN. I will yield after I have completed the analysis.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. KASTEN. The effect of the Melcher amendment is to impact primarily on the emergency military aid, which both the Inouye compromise and the administration request agrees on and to cut the $49 million figure to an $8 million figure.

That is important to recognize. There is some money in the pipeline for El Salvador that has not been spent. In my view, it is in the neighborhood of what we have been talking about, which is $140 million. It might be as high as $160 million. That money is economic assistance. It is not for military, medical, mobility, communications, and so forth. That money is $150 million of previously authorized and appropriated funds which are going to be used between now and the end of the fiscal year for economic assistance, and by law cannot be used for military assistance. It is prohibited from being used for any of the issues that we are here debating. That money is separate.

The reason it is in the pipeline is because we are only part of the way through the fiscal year. It will be spent. It is being spent on a schedule. It will be spent by the fall when we finish our fiscal year. There is a $19 million military assistance component which has—the Senator from Montana is correct—been set aside. That is, as the Senator will remember, the 30-percent Specter amendment which was agreed to by our subcommittee, and we withheld 30 percent of our previous military appropriation pending a verdict on the churchwomen's case.

That is withheld. The churchwomen's case is now proceeding. I am confident that it will come to a trial soon. That is the only part that could in anyway, shape, or form be used to meet these urgent needs.

It was also said that the money had not been authorized. The Senator from Massachusetts once more brought up the point that the money had not been authorized and somehow we are trying to skirt the authorization process. That simply is not true.

The appropriations we are providing are authorized. When we considered the continuing resolution last year, the House of Representatives appended the authorization legislation to that measure. When we went to conference we accepted that recommendation. We did so with the full encouragement of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

In fact, I would bring to my colleagues' attention section 101(b)(2) of the continuing resolution which is cited as the "international Security and Development Assistance Authorization Act of 1983." That is in the law. The authorization level for the military assistance program is $639,700,000, of which $510 million has been appropriated and enacted into law. Should Congress have approved the $93 million request, or should Congress now approve the $62 million Inouye compromise, it would still leave a significant unfunded authorization.

This provision of emergency funds in no way should affect the authorizing committee's prerogatives as far as overall policy toward Central America is concerned. In fact, all of these questions remain open and should be handled in the course of the regular process. The money that we are talking about today is authorized. The authorization committee, Senator PERCY and Senator PELL understand that and have indicated as much in letters to the administration and in comments to us. The dollars have been authorized.

They went beyond that, however. Last Tuesday there was a special hearing on Central American policy at the Foreign Relations Committee. Basically they went through an explanation of where those dollars might be going.

I would make just a final point because a number of people brought up, "If the President wants this money, why does not he ask for it?" It is correct that there are two funds in which the administration could request this money. One of them is section 506(a) which is basically a contingency defense stock fund, and the other is a section 21(d).

In the past the administration has used as a drawdown on the defense stock funds under section 506(a). We drew down $55 billion about 1½ or 2 years ago. That fund has in the past been used for El Salvador emergencies and 21(d) has not yet. That essentially is a delaying fund. You draw down and the dollars are paid back later. It brings out equipment. It is a delay in the payment.

One is a defense emergency contingency draw down. The other one is essentially a delaying financing mechanism. Both of those funds could have been used. Frankly, a number of us recommended at different times that they ought to be used for El Salvador. But the reason—the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Montana brought up this point—these funds were not used is because a significant number of Senators and Congressmen insisted that they not be used. The people who were opposed to the overall process and the people who were concerned about the expenditure of this money said in letters to the President, and in letters to the Secretary of State, do not do an end run around the Congress. Allow for debate in the Senate, and allow for debate in the House. Do not use the emergency funds.

I have before me a letter from the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator PERCY, on that fact. I have another letter in front of me from the ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee. We have letters from the chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee in the House and a letter signed by 23 members of the House Foreign Affairs authorization committee insisting that the emergency authority not be used, that we have the debate we are having today and that Congress have a chance to act on this money with up or down votes.

As everyone on this floor remembers we have not had a vote on this question for a number of years. There has not been an authorization bill. We are talking about "Why isn't it authorized?" We have been authorizing in the appropriations bill because the authorization bills have not moved through the process, either in the House or in the Senate. We are not waiting. The problem does not occur here, the problem occurs that neither authorization bill is passed. We have not had a record vote on this question up until last week when we voted on the Inouye amendment. We have not had a record vote since 1981 on El Salvador aid. People have preferred, frankly, Senator, to avoid those votes which we are now forcing today. It is important to recognize, No. 1, that the Melcher amendment significantly cuts the military assistance segment which is the key. There are not all sorts of dollars out here in some fund that have not been spent. Those dollars could not be spent for the purposes that the emergency assistance is addressing today.

But this is not an end run around Congress or the authorization committee. In fact, it was the chairman and ranking members of the authorization committees who are insisting upon the process that we are working with today; and lastly, we have a real emergency in El Salvador. We must go forward with this military assistance.

I would be happy to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts and also to the Senator from Montana.

I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts for a brief question.

Mr. KENNEDY. I have a couple of questions if I might yield to myself, if there is no objection, Mr. President.

Mr MELCHER. Mr. President, the control of the bill on this side should be properly with Mr. INOUYE.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator.

I was interested in listening to the Senator from Wisconsin talk about how we have arrived at where we are today—his reviews of the requests of various Members of the Senate, and the House, and the procedures of this body in terms.

That is, I would understand, a correct explanation up to a point. But the good Senator from Wisconsin has halted his explanation somewhat prematurely. Where we are now is this: We are considering an amendment to the appropriations bill at the same time as the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is considering this very issue, military aid to El Salvador. Rather than following the time-honored process of this body which permits the authorization committee first to give consideration to legislation authorizing the particular funds and then the appropriation committee to make the appropriation—we are basically circumventing the procedures of the Congress by adding this money on to the appropriations bill almost at the very moment when the Foreign Relations Committee is considering the whole issue of aid and assistance to El Salvador.

Mr. KASTEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would welcome that because in framing the question, I know the answer to this. I would dare say, as I mentioned earlier, that the urgency of this request had more to do with the possibility that Mr. D'Aubuisson would be elected and the desire of the administration to get as much resources and money in the pipeline as possible beforehand rather than to take a chance that he might not be elected, and following the procedures and the process of the Senate.

Mr. KASTEN. I would like to respond to the Senator by saying the Senator is right on the substance, but the Senator is mistaken about the law. At this point——

Mr. KENNEDY. Which law? The law that requires that we authorize before we appropriate or appropriate before we authorize?

Mr. KASTEN. The Senator is correct, that at this moment or during this period of time, the Foreign Relations Committee is in fact having hearings and is discussing the question of aid to Central America. They are discussing that in the context of the 1985 authorization bill. What we are discussing here today is emergency assistance in the context of the 1984 authorization bill which was incorporated into the continuing resolution last year.

So the Senator is correct, over the past week or so the Foreign Relations Committee has been discussing aid to Central America in the context of the 1985 authorization bill. Today we are dealing with the question of emergency assistance which has been authorized in the 1984 authorization bill which was included as part of the continuing resolution that we passed last year.

Mr. KENNEDY. Under the continuing resolution, there was $64.8 million, is that correct, under the continuing fiscal year 1984 resolution?

Mr. KASTEN. That number was correct in the appropriations part but if you look at the authorization part, the figure is much higher. The authorization level for military assistance was $639,700,000 of which $510 million has been appropriated.

Mr. KENNEDY. Let me get back to the point I mentioned earlier. Am I not correct that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is also considering the supplemental request for fiscal year 1984?

Mr. KASTEN. They may be considering the regular supplemental request. It may have come up in the hearings they had a week ago. But they, in their oversight responsibility, I am assuming, can do that any time they want. But the point is the dollars have been authorized and the procedure we are using is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I do not believe we are talking about semantics in this exchange. It is my understanding the Foreign Relations Committee is not only considering the fiscal year 1985 request but also the supplemental for fiscal year 1984.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time yielded to the Senator has expired.

Mr. KENNEDY. Will the Senator from Montana yield me 3 minutes?

Mr. MELCHER. Yes, Mr. President; I yield 3 minutes.

Mr. KENNEDY. The point is the Foreign Relations Committee is considering not only fiscal year 1985 but also, I understand, the supplemental for fiscal year 1984. It is important to understand that this is not just an issue or problem that starts one year and stops in another. We are talking about an expanding policy of militarizing the problem in El Salvador. These issues do not just stop one day in one fiscal year and start in another. I think the ramifications of this process and procedure were very well discussed last Thursday by the ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee. For the reference of our colleagues, page 7073 of the March 29 RECORD probably puts this issue in perspective in terms of the process and procedures as well as any other explanation. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, in the press of debate by both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Montana, it has been suggested that the military ought to be using one of its executive branch drawdown authorities. Am I to believe the Senator from Montana or the Senator from Massachusetts in fact would support that and that they believe that the more proper way of providing this emergency military assistance would be through a drawdown on either section 506(a) or 21(b)?

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator is addressing me, the fact, Mr. President, is I do not. For reasons I have outlined earlier, I believe that if that were an emergency with regard to the period of time between now and the time of the El Salvador presidential election I would not oppose it. I would not oppose it, if that is the question of the Senator from Wisconsin. I believe we are entitled to learn the outcome of that particular election prior to making what I consider to be virtually an open-ended commitment of the Congress of the United States to the El Salvadoran Government, no matter who wins that election.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Senator. He said if there were an emergency between now and then, he would not oppose the emergency drawdown.

Mr. KENNEDY. Up to the time of the election. That is my position. That is why in an amendment which I will offer I authorize and appropriate moneys between now and the election. That is my position. The U.S. Congress and the American people ought not to commit to future aid levels until after we know the outcome of that election.

Mr. MELCHER. Might I answer the question posed by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KASTEN. I yield to the Senator from Montana for a brief answer.

Mr. MELCHER. I will make it very brief. If the President chooses out of his descretionary funds, the funds you mentioned first, which I believe total $75 million, and if he wants to tell the American people that he sees such an imminent threat in El Salvador and he needs additional arms down there in the next 90 days, and we better quit talking about getting them down there next week or prior to the election coming up in a month, if he thinks that there is that great a threat that he has to have them right away and wants to get them down there within 90 days, I am not going to criticize him using a lot of those funds. I disagree with him and will tell him it is bad policy. But they are his discretionary funds and he is to use them as he pleases.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Senators. I hope we are able to proceed now that the debate has begun, but if this is delayed over a long period of time, I think the administration might once more find itself in the position of having to consider using those emergency drawdowns. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Hawaii such time as he may require.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, this debate on Central America is long overdue. As one Member of this body, I am happy that it is finally happening because El Salvador did not become a problem only yesterday or today. It has been with us for decades.

Nicaragua did not happen just yesterday or, for that matter, this past weekend. It has been with us for decades.

Fidel Castro is not a problem that just occurred a few years ago. The birth of Castroism was a logical consequence of Batista's misrule.

As a Member of this body, I have tried my best with my small and insignificant voice to alert my friends here that we were leading ourselves down a path of destruction.

I have given many speeches here suggesting that we served as the midwife in the birth of Castroism. We knew the brutality of Fulgencio Batista; we knew of his corruption; we knew of his prisons; yet we closed our eyes. Even if we were unaware that, eventually people would rise up against brutality and dictatorship, we should have expected the creation of a Castro in Cuba.

I would like to remind my colleagues that when we had the debate on aid to Nicaragua, one Senator stood up and said, "Let us not make this mistake again." In the past, we had been guilty of holding up, supporting, and financing the Somoza family. We knew of his corruption. We knew of his brutality. They were not secret. But, in the past, in the name of anticommunism we said, "Let's give him all he wants."

Finally, when it came time for us to consider participation in covert activities, my colleagues will recall, I stood in the well because it was supposed to be important enough for discussion in the well. I said, "Let us not compound this problem by getting in further."

Mr. President, as one of my last acts as chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, I turned down a request of former President Carter for military assistance to El Salvador. Under the authority of the reprograming provision in the Foreign Assistance Act he had requested $5.7 million for military equipment for El Salvador. My colleagues may have forgotten this. At that time, I said as chairman I would suggest its approval if the administration would assure us that the moneys would not be spent to puchase lethal weapons.

Oh, that was ancient history. It was a long time ago. I am pleased to say that the subcommittee went along. I think the record will show that this was the first time conditionality was brought into our assistance programs in Central America.

Having opposed our military involvement in that part of the world for a long time, the question has been asked, and I think rather validly, why am I now suggesting this so-called compromise? Mr. President, over the years, all of us here have participated in creating a military monster there. If we should decide at this moment to stop all aid, that would also end all restraints on the hotheads in that part of the world. What will happen then will be a bloodbath. The death squad activities will, once again, flourish; the military leaders will decide that if the United States is going to wash its hands, what have they got to lose?

Mr. President, what I have been trying to do is to provide a minimum which I hope will keep the military in check while democracy is given an opportunity. An election has just been held in El Salvador. I was not there to monitor the election, but my colleagues tell me that it was something to behold. It may be the last opportunity we have there for some semblance of democracy to rise up. If we are to give that semblance of hope a chance to flourish, then some little amount must be given to keep that hope alive.

I hope that in this debate, we shall have sufficient time for all of us to look back in history and learn a few lessons. Just a few months ago, I tried my best to suggest that the invasion of Grenada was not only in violation of our Constitution, it was also a violation of the War Powers Act, and I also suggested that we may be planting a seed of tragedy there. Mr. President, you will recall that one of the arguments made for our invasion was that here was a major airport development, which the Grenadian Government at that time said was for its tourist industry. But our President said no, it was not for the tourist industry, it was part of the military buildup in that part of the world.

Now we are there. The Cubans are out; we are in charge. We are now proposing millions of dollars to build up this airport and we are proclaiming to the world that it will not be for military purposes, it will be for tourism in Grenada. We are going to be appropriating moneys to shore up the government there and to build up a small military. I do not know why the Grenadians need a military, but we will be providing $40 million out of the Lebanon account to build this airport and additional requests will be coming in for security assistance.

If we do not want an El Salvador in the future in Grenada, let us nip the bud right here. There is no reason or requirement for military assistance to Grenada.

Mr. President, we have spent millions in El Salvador, and all of us—no one can say he stood up alone—all of us supported it. But a few of us, sensing the problems which lie ahead, tried to add conditionality. We tried to limit U.S. involvement and to encourage reform. All of these conditions came from the subcommittee of Mr. KASTEN—the 55 limitation on trainees and advisers, the limitation on the use of funds for nonlethal weapons, the reservation of $19 million until a verdict was handed down in the trial of those accused of the murder of four American churchwomen. The Senator's subcommittee has been working, and a few days ago, in the Appropriations Committee, I made an attempt, a very serious attempt, to hold up the consideration of this urgent supplemental for El Salvador until the election process was completed. As you know, Mr. President, I was voted down 16 to 13. I concluded that if the question put to this body was the appropriation of $93 million in military assistance or zero, the $93 million request would prevail. I hope that this so-called compromise will prevail, because at least we shall cut down the level of funding and the level of violence.

Mr. President, I am told that the election in El Salvador was successful. Let us give that election a chance to succeed completely. I am convinced that if this amendment prevails and if it succeeds in the House and becomes the law of the land the election process in El Salvador will be threatened. Sadly, I must say to the Members of this body that the reduction proposed in this amendment would result either in a coup d'etat or the reactivation of the death squads or another bloodbath. History tells us that the military in El Salvador was let loose in 1932—oh, that is a long, long time ago, Mr. President. In 1932, in that bloodbath, 30,000 peasants were slaughtered. I do not want that on my conscience.

I think my amendment, the so-called compromise amendment, will give that little spark of democracy some hope of flourishing. So I hope my colleagues will vote down the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, how much time remains on the Melcher amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty minutes and 15 seconds for the Senator from Montana; 11 minutes and 38 seconds for the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, if I might have the attention of the Senate, I see no more Senators who at this time want to further debate the Melcher amendment——

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

Mr. KASTEN. I would be happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. MELCHER. I do want to inform the floor manager of the bill that I do have some remarks to make. They will not take very long. Then we can enter into what I suspect is an agreement that we both would probably like to have.

Mr. KASTEN. I then suggest, after the Senator from Montana makes his concluding remarks, that we yield back all but a small portion of the time, maybe 5 or 10 minutes on each side, on the Melcher amendment, and proceed to a Kennedy amendment that I expect to be offered. That Kennedy amendment is listed on our unanimous-consent request as an amendment in the first degree, but amendments on that unanimous-consent list may be offered as amendments in the second degree. The time limit for the amendments on this list, whether they be first-degree amendments or second-degree amendments, remains the same. So the Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. President, does not by offering this amendment as a second-degree amendment waive his time.

It is then my understanding we would debate the Kennedy amendment for whatever time is necessary. It is also my further understanding we would then try to set that amendment aside because there are a number of Senators on either side who will be present within the next couple of hours who may wish to speak, and we will try to set at least two votes between 6 and 6:30. Then we could possibly proceed to a third amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts having to do with displaced persons in El Salvador. Possibly we could debate that amendment and proceed with it. That amendment may or may not take a recorded vote, but I think we will wait to see how that develops.

That is the overall plan on which I hope we can move forward. I am not putting this in terms of a unanimous-consent request at this time.

I am happy, Mr. President, to yield the floor.

Mr. MELCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Hawaii, with his usual eloquence, which I very much admire, has said the problems in Central America and El Salvador have not originated overnight; that they are long standing and that they beg for an adequate discussion on the Senate floor and hopefully for a better policy for Central America.

But my amendment, of course, will not let loose a bloodbath. My amendment will not contribute to that. However, the makings of a bloodbath have been in El Salvador, as they have been in Guatemala, as they have been in other Central American countries for longer than my lifetime.

Mr. President, when we talk so blithely—whether it is lucid or not I am not sure—about the scores of millions of dollars that are available for El Salvador at this time and about the hundreds of millions of dollars recommended by President Reagan to be expended in El Salvador over the next 1½ years, we should take note that a blithe discussion on this Senate floor, in this town of Washington, D.C., in the United States does have a great deal to do with the attitudes and what the outcome will be in El Salvador and how it fits into a Central American policy for the United States. We should have a Central American policy for justice, what we expound here in the United States, and that is agreed to as being progressive and right by our other neighbors of Central America as well as South America.

We have spent a little time talking about what funds are already appropriated and available. It is absolutely incorrect to assume that somehow those are not vast sums of money for a very tiny country.

Those are vast sums of money. The $19 million that is still available in military aid, already appropriated but cannot be expended until the outcome of the trial for the slain nuns has been determined, is a big amount of money for El Salvador, for their army, for the insurgents, for both of them. The $95 million in economic security funds which is available for airstrips, for buildings that can be used by the military as well as road construction, as well as all of those things that go into a military operation, is a vast amount of money for El Salvador. It is a very small country. You can lose it in the State of Montana. You have to hunt for it in its entirety. There are 4 million people down there, which is not a great number of people. That $95 million, aside from being available for all of those purposes, can be used to free money in the El Salvador budget for arms purchases, from us or from somebody else. That is what economic support funds are available for.

The Senator from Wisconsin could not find the $14 million that I included in my amendment for food aid as part of the President's request but, indeed, it is in the President's overall supplemental request for 1984. Of the money already appropriated and left unspent for El Salvador, the smallest amount is $5 million for food. And so recognizing that the President in his January budget request, specifically in the supplemental request recommended $14 million for food aid, I include that. I include the $13.5 million specifically for medical aid, which is a little over a million dollars more than what was earmarked for medical aid in the Inouye amendment.

In addition to all of that, I ask for another $8 million which would be available for military aid. I wonder, since all of these funds are still available, whether even that $8 million for more military aid is needed. Out of deference to all the Senators and all the people in the administration and to the Government of El Salvador, I have it in there. So there is plenty of money for them. All we are enunciating is a shift in policy; that we already have so many funds available for a very small country, for armaments and for other purposes that we are not going to go whole hog and give them every so-called compromise dollar that President Reagan is recommending.

My colleagues who were down there Sunday before last as observers for the election have come back impressed with the sincerity of the Salvadoran people. They say they can read in their faces and they hear from their very lips the Salvadoran hope that the election process will lead to some stability and peace for their government. Who would deny them that hope?

No; I would not deny them that hope. I would hope to contribute to their hopes. As a Senator, I would hope to aid their hopes for peaceful settlement of their disputes and an opportunity to advance their personal lives and the lives of their families.

But democracy does not feed nor live on armaments. In this case, we are thwarting the opportunity for democracy in that country by simple mathematics.

If you can believe all the rhetoric over the past 4 years in justifying the appropriation bills for El Salvador, particularly those comments made by this administration, justifying urgent, special, emergency, military aid for El Salvador in the supplemental bills, if it is possible to believe those comments, then all that stands in the way of democracy and opportunity for the people of El Salvador are 10,000 insurgents.

If, by some stretch of the imagination, you can believe that by appropriating dollars out of the Treasury of the United States to kill those insurgents—in what year are they all going to be killed? How many times do we have to divide 10,000 into $200 million, into $300 million, into $400 million, into $500 million, from the U.S. Treasury, to accomplish that goal? How many times do we have to divide that to see how much should be appropriated each year to eliminate each and every one of those 10,000 insurgents? That is a gruesome thought, but, in effect, it is the argument that is consistently made to appropriate these funds—to eliminate the insurgents.

First, in 1981, it was $10 million appropriated. It came down to $1,000 per guerrilla. Then it jumped up to $10,000 in last year's appropriation—not the current fiscal year, but last year. Now, if we take everything the President has asked for it is about $30,000 per insurgent. Between now and the end of October, we might as well look at what he is asking for the balance of this year and into next year, and it is $700 million. So that would be $70,000 per insurgent.

Bloodbath, indeed. Armaments flow from the United States to arm the Army of El Salvador, to be captured in skirmishes by the insurgents to arm themselves, and so we supply both sides.

Mr. President, that is contrary to the Monroe Doctrine, because the Monroe Doctrine instructed us to stop military intervention from outside the hemisphere from upsetting countries within this hemisphere. That intervention could be properly addressed in methods I referred to in my earlier comments that would be consistent with the Monroe Doctrine. Our arms shipments to El Salvador are contrary to the Rio Treaty and contrary to the views of the Organization of American States, and contrary to the views of our friends in Central America.

Mr. President, I am going to rest my case on my amendment at this point, and I welcome the unanimous-consent request that will be made by the manager of the bill, my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DURENBERGER). The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. First, Mr. President, I hope the Melcher amendment will be defeated. I think it is important to recognize that it is a reduction in the military assistance, which I believe would put the future of the elections in great jeopardy and would also put the future of El Salvador and our policy in Central America in great jeopardy. I am confident that the Senate will reject the amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Soldiering," by Mr. Fred Reed, talking about the shortages plaguing the Salvadoran Army.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOLDIERING

(By Fred Reed)

SHORTAGES PLAGUE SALVADOR'S ARMY

SAN FRANCISCO GOTERA, EL SALVADOR.—For three days I have been a guest of the Morazan Battalion, headquartered in this low, poor, pastel, and dirty city. With me are an American doctor and another American, an authority on military small arms. We have been depressed by the Salvadoran Army. Regarding which:

1. It is badly equipped. Its rifles and machines guns—M16s, G-3s, and M60s—are worn out, used up. The soldiers say they have never even seen cleaning gear. There are no spare parts, as for example bolts and barrels, and no armorers to repair broken weapons. We found troops using arctic-grade gun-oil, which was all they had. El Salvador is not in the arctic. Infantry weapons are easy to maintain, up to a point. Then you need knowledge and tools. For example, an untrained soldier cannot strip the bolt of a .50 caliber machine gun. The troops here tried, reassembled it incorrectly, and destroyed it when they fired it. Even an armorer needs all sorts of esoterica such as go-no-go gauges, barrel wrenches, stones, and expertise. If you don't have them, guns slowly become useless.

2. Their medical situation is criminal. They have almost no trained medics. The "medics" they have go into combat with a few field dressings, some penicillin, and maybe a bottle of glucose solution. The latter, my doctor friend growls, is almost useless as a blood replacement. A Salvadoran told us they had saline solution, but for some reason didn't use it. They are no medevac helicopters. The army has only 20 choppers, only some of which will work at a given time. They are used primarily for moving troops and cargo, and for medical purposes only when otherwise idle. This means that badly wounded men can wait six or eight hours before reaching care. They can't be treated in the field because no one knows how to do it. Often the wounded come out in trucks—bleeding, unsplinted, and alone, because there are no medics to ride with them. The level of medical ignorance is very high, and so is the death rate. A friend of mine tells of flying behind the lead chopper on a medevac run and noticing oil leaking along the side of the lead bird. It wasn't oil. A wounded man had a severed femoral artery and the door-gunner didn't know how to tie him off. He died. So goes this little war.

3. They need radios. We saw a few, but not nearly enough. A counter-guerrilla war involves patrols by small units, and close cooperation with mobile troops, as for example heliborne reaction forces. This is wild country. Without radios—lots of them—any soldiers you can't see might as well not exist. When a radio breaks, they can't fix it, and they can't quickly get anyone else to do it. It's a lonely feeling to be guarding a bridge or road out in the hot overgrown hill country, 20 feet from bushes you can't see through, with no way to call for help.

4. I saw no sign that people hereabouts are afraid of the army. Some of the police here have an evil reputation, very evil, but the army is a different entity. In regions I visited, the populace showed no sign of alarm or even particular interest when the army appeared.

5. Training is lousy. Although I am told by friends who should know that it is improving. More on this next week.

6. To editorialize a bit, it looks as though the United States is doing just enough to get these people in deep trouble, but not enough to get them out, I'm afraid we will give them enough to keep them afloat while the war gets nice and vicious and big. Then we will pull the plug, as in Cambodia, and a bloodbath will follow.

Maybe we should not play half-seriously at war. Half-seriouly at wars abroad entails responsibilities.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, how much time remains on the Melcher amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana has 17 minutes and 41 seconds. The Senator from Wisconsin has 8 minutes and 16 seconds.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Melcher amendment be temporarily laid aside, and that a vote occur on the Melcher amendment immediately following the vote on the Kennedy amendment, and that the vote on the Kennedy amendment occur at 6:15 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I now suggest to the Senator from Montana that we yield back all but a small part of our time, the Senator suggested between 5 and 10 minutes for debate. I say to the Senator that I have received requests from a number of Senators who are very anxious to leave the Chamber as close to the dinner hour as possible tonight, and we are seeing pressure to delay the votes and to have our recess time as early as possible tonight.

So I hope we could yield back all our time except for 5 minutes for the Senator from Montana and 5 minutes for the Senator from Wisconsin. That debate would occur immediately following the Kennedy amendment and preceding the vote on the Melcher amendment.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KASTEN. I yield.

Mr. MELCHER. I believe that 5 minutes on each side will probably be adequate, but, just for protection, I suggest 7 minutes.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield back all my time except for 7 minutes.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent request, do I correctly understand that we will proceed on the Kennedy amendment or have time on the bill until 6:15?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MELCHER. I make a further inquiry: If I yield back all my time on my amendment, except for about 7 minutes, I will be able to utilize that 7 minutes after the vote on the Kennedy amendment and just prior to the vote on my amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not according to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I yield back all my time, except 7 minutes, and that the Senator from Montana yield back all his time, except 7 minutes; that the debate on the Melcher amendment, 7 minutes on each side, occur immediately preceding the vote on the Melcher amendment and immediately following the vote on the Kennedy amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, on that basis, I do yield back my time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I have no intention of objecting—I should like the attention of the Senator from Montana.

I hope we will have a good debate on my amendment. Some of the points have been covered in the discussion by Senator MELCHER.

I have another amendment, dealing with displaced persons in El Salvador, if we are able to complete the discussion on this amendment. I have no objection to proceeding to that, if there is time prior to the 6:15 rollcall vote.

I just heard the Senator from Montana indicate he understood there would be no other matters considered during that period of time.

I wish to indicate to the floor manager that I have no objection to proceeding to that if we complete the discussion of my amendment at that time.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I ask the Senator from Montana whether he finds that would be inconsistent with his understanding.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. MELCHER. I do not find that inconsistent, if we are talking about a vote to occur at 6:15 p.m. on the Kennedy amendment, the first Kennedy amendment offered, and then that would be followed immediately by 14 minutes equally divided between the Senator from Wisconsin and myself just prior to the next vote, in other words, the second vote, which is my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, at what time does the first vote start?

Mr. INOUYE. 6:15 p.m.

Mr. STEVENS. So that is 20 minutes. Is there time before that for debate?

Mr. KENNEDY. No. We debate that now, part of that prior to the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. STEVENS. I am trying to figure out the time sequence there.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Alaska that I am not sure who had the floor——

Mr. STEVENS. I reserved the right to object.

Mr. KASTEN. If the Senator will yield to me to answer the question, the vote on the first amendment will occur at 6:15.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. KASTEN. That vote will take 15 minutes. So at 6:30 p.m. we will begin the limited debate on the Melcher amendment, and at 6:45 p.m. the vote on the Melcher amendment will occur, and that will be, it is anticipated, a 15-minute rollcall vote.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it the intention of the manager of the bill to stack other votes for this evening?

Mr. KASTEN. It is my intention to not stack other votes this evening. I am not sure we could get to other votes because we will have a debate on the Kennedy amendment now, and then it is anticipated that we will have a debate on a second Kennedy amendment having to do with assistance to displaced persons in El Salvador, and at this time a record vote on that question is not anticipated.

So it would be my best judgment, although I cannot guarantee the Senator from Alaska, that we would have two votes this evening, one would be occurring at roughly 6:15 p.m., and one would be occurring roughly at 6:45 p.m.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator for his patience.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2877

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) proposes an amendment numbered 2877.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, line 6, delete the figure "$61,750,000" and substitute in lieu thereof "$21,000,000."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this amendment is identical to amendment No. 2835, but it has been redrafted to accord with the earlier actions by the Senate when it accepted the Inouye amendment last week.

Mr. President, it is my understanding there is a 2-hour time limitation, 2 hours to be equally divided on each side. Of that time, 1 hour is to be controlled by myself and 1 hour by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Am I correct?

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I wish to point out to the Senate that I believe the Senator's interpretation is correct, and if we go back to page 2 of the unanimous-consent agreement, the Senator, in my opinion, is offering the first amendment listed as the Kennedy amendment restricting aid to El Salvador on which there shall be 2 hours equally divided. That is the amendment that is now being put forward, and it is my understanding there will be a 2-hour time limit equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the same opinion.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Chair and the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. President, today we begin a debate on whether additional military assistance should be provided to the Government of El Salvador. If we agree that the United States should, in fact, continue to provide such assistance, the further question is: What is the appropriate amount of military assistance that the United States should vote for today?

Let me begin by quoting from a letter sent by Archbishop Oscar Romero to President Jimmy Carter on February 17, 1980, 5 weeks before the Archbishop was assassinated while he was saying mass.

He wrote:

As a Salvadoran and as Archbishop of San Salvador, I have the obligation of seeing to it that faith and justice reign in my country. Therefore, assuming you truly want to defend human rights, I ask that you do two things:

Prohibit all military assistance to the Salvadoran Government.

Guarantee that your government will not intervene directly or indirectly, by means of military, economic, diplomatic or other pressures, to influence the direction of the destiny of the Salvadoran people.

The Archbishop went on to say:

It would be totally wrong and deplorable if the Salvadoran people were to be frustrated, repressed, or in any way impeded from deciding for itself the economic and political future of our country by intervention on the part of a foreign power . . . I hope that your religious sentiments and your desire for the defense of human rights will move you to accept my petition and thereby avoid intensifying the bloodshed in this tormented country.

That was where Archbishop Romero stood on the eve of his murder in the winter of 1980.

What has happened since that time?

In his budget, President Carter provided $10 million in military assistance to El Salvador, and President Reagan added another $25 million after his election, for a total of $35 million in military assistance for fiscal year 1981.

The next year, the United States provided an additional $81 million in military assistance to El Salvador, more than doubling the amount from the previous year.

And in the years since then, the United States provided another $81.3 million in military aid, and then an additional $64.8 million.

Since Archbishop Romero's appeal in 1980 to halt all further military assistance, the United States has appropriated a total of $262.1 million for military assistance for El Salvador and we have sent over $1.1 billion in military and economic assistance since 1981.

As we begin this debate, and as we reflect back on Archbishop Romero's request of President Carter in 1980, it seems only fair to ask: What have we accomplished with the military assistance that has been provided in the past? What is it that we hope to accomplish with the military assistance that we are being asked to provide for the future?

In 1980, there were approximately 2,000 guerrillas active and under arms in the Salvadoran countryside. Today, according to the Kissinger Commission report, there are an estimated 6,000 frontline guerrillas and a slightly larger number organized in militia and support units. But these latter forces have been increasingly well armed and involved in operations with the frontline forces. The insurgents can now put perhaps as many as 12,000 trained and armed fighters in the field. Since 1980, the guerrilla forces have increased six times.

What has been done with the weapons that we have sent to El Salvador?

Last month, Under Secretary of Defense Ikle reported to Congress that the guerrillas are securing—one way or another—as much as 50 percent of their weaponry from supplies sent to El Salvador by the United States. On Sunday, the Secretary of State belittled that report, saying that it was based on figures from only one region of the country and did not reflect the situation throughout El Salvador. He was obviously distressed at Mr. Ikle's admission. How convenient that he suddenly discovered this distinction. Yet, there can be no doubt that our military assistance goes in substantial amounts to the guerrillas as well as to the Salvadoran Army. In this war, we are supplying the guns for both sides.

What is the military situation in El Salvador?

According to the Kissinger Commission report:

In the absence of significant Salvadoran military forces, armed guerrillas operate at will throughout the countryside. They have established the rudiments of a civil administration and have enforced a tax regime in areas under their control. Increasingly, they are able to mass their forces and overwhelm isolated garrisons or ambush relief columns.

Journalists estimate that the guerrillas control between 20 and 30 percent of the countryside. In an interview in December 1983 with the acting commander of the Atlantic Brigade, he stated that the guerrillas control between 30 and 40 percent of the countryside.

What is the objective of our policy in El Salvador? Do we seek a military victory or are we working toward a negotiated peace?

According to the Salvadoran Ambassador to the United States, there can be no negotiations with the opposition. He said:

Let Villalobos go to Arafat. In El Salvador he would have to be prosecuted, he's a war criminal. If he turned himself in, sure as hell he would have to be convicted. This is true for all of the guerrilla commanders . . . Ungo, Lamora and other FDR leaders are as much guerrillas as Villalobos and the others, by their choice. They would probably get the death penalty.

Despite an occasional gesture toward peace, the present Salvadoran Government seems committed only to the peace of military victory.

And the Kissinger commission reaches the same conclusion—that the path toward peace requires more war—and a successful military strategy. As the commission reported:

There might be an argument for doing nothing to help the Government of El Salvador. There might be an argument for doing a great deal more. There is, however, no logical argument for giving some aid but not enough. The worst possible policy for El Salvador is to provide just enough aid to keep the war going, but too little to wage it successfully.

Mr. President, that is precisely the kind of argument that kept us in Vietnam. That is precisely the kind of argument that cost this Nation during the Kissinger years 35,000 lives in the jungles and swamps of Southeast Asia. That is precisely the kind of argument that will lead to increased violence and more bloodshed in El Salvador. That is precisely the kind of argument that will bring United States troops into the conflict in El Salvador.

What are we being asked to do today, and what are the Reagan administration's plans for the future?

Today we are being asked to give our approval for an additional $61.7 million in military assistance, the first installment of the administration's overall supplemental request for fiscal year 1984 of $178.7 million. If this $178.7 million is approved by Congress, it would mean a total of $243.5 million in additional military assistance for this year alone. This is more than three times the amount that was appropriated by Congress for last year. And we are told that the administration plans to request an additional $132.5 million in military assistance for next year.

In El Salvador, by escalating the military aid, we are escalating the stakes and escalating the conflict and escalating the casualties. But that is not all we are doing. We are pursuing a policy in El Salvador that ultimately can only succeed with the use of U.S. combat troops—which would represent the greatest failure our policy could bring.

I do not agree—and I do not think that the American people agree—that we must provide the Salvadoran military whatever it wants "to wage (this war) successfully," as the Kissinger commission recommends.

Sending more and more military assistance is not the only answer; there is a logical argument for reducing our reliance on war as the path toward peace in El Salvador. There is a logical argument for telling the Salvadoran military that it does not have a blank check from the people of the United States.

What ever happened to diplomacy?

This administration seems to think that the answer to every tough problem in the world is more guns, more bullets, more soldiers. This administration cannot point to a single major successful diplomatic initiative since it came into office. Instead, it has demonstrated an instinctive, knee-jerk preference for armed force as the means of attaining our foreign policy objectives.

I respectively submit that armed force should be the course of last resort, that pulling the trigger, or dropping the bomb, or calling in the marines should not come first, it should come last.

There is a blindness that seems to afflict our policymakers here in Washington almost as much as it has distored the politics of El Salvador. That blindness is the assumption that if someone is working to help the poor, is tending to the ill, is bringing food to the hungry, and is seeking social justice and political reform, then that person is, for some reason, a Soviet surrogate and must be stopped at all costs.

That is the way to transform peace-loving men and women into violent revolutionaries. As President Kennedy said, "If we make peaceful change impossible, we make violent revolution inevitable."

Let me return to the example of Archbishop Romero. He was not a Communist. He was not a Soviet surrogate. He was a devout Catholic who dreamed of peace and social justice in El Salvador. On February 2, 1980, he said, "the world that the church must serve is the world of the poor * * *." Did they kill Archbishop Romero because he cared for the poor?

He said, "it is the poor who force us to understand what is really taking place * * * the persecution of the church is a result of defending the poor." Did they kill Archbishop Romero because he defended the poor?

He said, "there are those who fill their houses with violence, fill their houses with what they have stolen. There are those who crush the poor * * * while lying on beds of the most exquisite marble. There are those who take over house after house, field after field, until they own the territory and are the only ones in it." Did they kill Archbishop Romero because he looked at the privileged and spoke out against their injustice?

He said, "how evil this system must be to pit the poor against the poor; the peasant in the army uniform against the worker peasant." Did they kill Archbishop Romero because he was against the war in El Salvador?

On the eve of his murder he said, "As a shepherd I am obliged by divine law to give my life for those I love, for the entire Salvadoran people, including those Salvadorans who threaten to assassinate me. If they should go so far as to carry out their threats, I want you to know that I now offer my blood to God for justice and for the resurrection of El Salvador."

In the name of God, why was this man killed? Who gained from this man's death? Who ordered this man's murder?

There is an answer to these questions. Former Ambassador Robert White has testified that, when he was Ambassdor, he had evidence implicating Roberto d'Aubuisson in the murder of Archbishop Romero. And more recently, a Salvadoran who served as head of military intelligence in 1980 and 1981, Col. Roberto Santivanez, stated that he has personal knowledge of the participation of Roberto d'Aubuisson in the killing of Archbishop Romero. According to Santivanez, it was D'Aubuisson who ordered the murder of the archbishop in a meeting with Salvadoran exiles in Guatemala; it was D'Aubuisson who organized the death squad; it was D'Aubuisson's men who followed the archbishop to learn his habits; and it was D'Aubuisson who personally selected the four men who actually carried out the killing.

I do not think that the people of the United States want to send millions of dollars in military assistance to a government run by Roberto d'Aubuisson.

On Sunday, Secretary of State Shultz stated that he thought we should support the Government of El Salvador no matter who is elected President. I say "No" to that—and so should the Senate.

On Sunday, Secretary of State Shultz said that we should send more guns, more bullets, more military assistance to El Salvador even if the President of El Salvador is Roberto d'Aubuisson. I say "No" to that—and so should the Senate.

Let us ask ourselves today, what is the path toward peace and justice in El Salvador? How can we help to achieve the resurrection of El Salvador? I do not believe that this can be accomplished by guaranteeing millions of dollars of military assistance even if Roberto d'Aubuisson is elected President.

The United States is a great nation, and it is also a powerful nation. But above all, it is a decent nation, and the people of the United States are a decent people. We can be proud of our history, and of our traditions, and of our founding principles. We should take pride in pursuing peace where there is war, in seeking justice where there is injustice, in bringing hope to those who are helpless. Let us not turn our backs on the very ideals that have made the United States of America special—special throughout history and special today in the hearts of men and women throughout the world.

We in the U.S. Senate have an obligation to protect, preserve, and defend the ideals and principles that are as ancient as the Scriptures and as clear as our own Constitution.

We must not pursue a path that is unworthy of our heritage. We must not vote today to send guns and bullets to support a man who would desecrate the ideals of Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln.

I am not saying that we should halt all military assistance to El Salvador forthwith. I am saying that we should not give a blank check for dictatorship, death squads, and repression.

We are faced today with a request for $61.75 million in additional military assistance to the Government of El Salvador. That sum of money is intended to last the Government for 6 months—until October of this year.

If we vote our approval for that level of funding today, we are giving the new Government of El Salvador—to be inaugurated in June—$40 million in military assistance from June through September without knowing who will be running that new Government.

Let us provide the aid that is needed only for between now and the month following the runoff elections. Let us appropriate today only $21 million. Before voting to appropriate more, let us wait and see who is the next President of El Salvador.

Let us take the advice of one of the leaders of the U.S. Senate, who recently wrote of this tragedy in Central America.

He said:

> I fear that America is stumbling blindly toward the abyss . . . I am gravely concerned that, if we follow the course charted by the Reagan administration, the United States will be caught up in the maelstrom of violence.

Senator DANIEL INOUYE went on to say:

> The tragedy which awaits us, unless we exercise the courage and wisdom to avert it, is that the forces of our democracy will be employed in the service of tyranny and repression.

If we appropriate this entire $61.75 million today, Senator INOUYE's prophecy may become fact. For if Roberto D'Aubuisson is elected President of El Salvador in May, we will be giving him $40 million in military assistance to use as he sees fit.

I know there are those who say: This is the President's problem; let us leave him with it and with the political difficulties it may bring. But I heard similar arguments during Lebanon, and earlier during the Vietnam conflict. This is America's problem; it is the Senate's problem; and neither history nor the voters will let us wash our hands of the responsibility.

For too many years, we have been told we must rely on military solutions—or we will lose. In fear of being blamed, too many among us have listened and so we have followed the military path. We have sought a military solution—and time after time, we have lost.

This time, let us try the course of negotiation, of peaceful settlement, or progress instead of repression. If we do, I believe that at long last we can win a victory—for people as well as for peace; for our principles and for the belief that American, and surely not the Soviet Union, truly is "the last, best hope" of the oppressed of the Earth and of all those who yearn to be free.

Mr. President, there is one other item before us—the compromise proposal of $61.75 million. I take not that there is no provision in that particular proposal to fence off any of the money, as was the judgment of this body last year pending the outcome of the trial of those charged with the murder of four American churchwomen. There are amendments which will be proposed by my colleague and good friend, the Senator from Connecticut, Senator DODD, on this fencing issue. I understand also that there was an amendment introduced by Senator SPECTER on this issue last week. But the Senate has not addressed that issue at this time.

It seems to me that the votes that we are going to have this afternoon for a reduced amount certainly should be much more consistent for those that are very much concerned with the failure of the system of justice in El Salvador. That system has failed to punish the killers of the four American churchwomen and the American labor advisers.

The amendment I propose will give us an opportunity to review both the outcome of the election, which will be held on the last Sunday in April, or the first Sunday in May, since this appropriation would carry us through until the end of May. It also would give us an opportunity to review what action, if any, will actually have been taken by the Salvadoran Government in April on the trial of those charged in the murder of the four American churchwomen. Also, we will have more information about the prosecution of those who committed the crimes against the labor advisers.

I will be glad to yield for any response that the Senator from Wisconsin, or others, would like to make. Otherwise, I will read very briefly an excerpt from a very fine article that was written about the military situation in El Salvador by a very distinguished journalist, Mr. Christopher Dickey. I will include that now.

This analysis states as concisely as could be said the very serious problems of relying upon a military solution to the range of different problems that face El Salvador today.

In his excellent article in the book "Central America: Anatomy of a Conflict," Mr. Dickey makes this point. I will read into the RECORD this portion of this chapter because I think it is enormously relevant to our debate.

> Throughout 1982 and early 1983 the U.S. State Department was at least able to argue that "abuses" by the security forces were decreasing and the "death squads" disappearing. The embassy's regular reports known as "grim grams" cited statistics based on local press accounts and noted, accurately, a general reduction of tension in the capital. U.S. policy was working, U.S. officials said. Its demands on the Salvadorans were understood and were being complied with, they said.
> In retrospect it is now apparent that the decline in urban slaughter came about less because of improved command and control than because the left has basically abandoned the capital after January 1981. With few suspects there were fewer killings. Murder in the countryside, meanwhile, was less frequently reported in the local papers and thus did not show up in the "grim gram" statistics. As soon as the left's efforts to renew operations and organizing in the capital became evident in mid-1983, the death squads and the "abuses" began to rise once again. The "process of control" over the armed forces, at least insofar as the slaughter of suspected rebel sympathizers was concerned, proved once again to be a paper promise.
> Compounding the political problems raised by the revival of the death squads in the cities, from Washington's viewpoint, was the military dilemma provoked by the Salvadoran army's seeming inability to mount effective campaigns against any force capable of shooting back. At weekly background briefings in the U.S. embassy during 1982 and 1983, top U.S. advisers talked to the press about the ineptness of many Salvadoran commanders, especially those who had proved unable or unwilling to adopt the kind of search and destroy tactics the Pentagon recommended.
> The advisers blamed the cliquishness of the Salvadoran officer corps for much of the problem. Men who had known each other since they were in their teens, who were bound by tradition, by compadrazco, in some instances by marriage, tended to cover for each others' abuses or incompetence in any case, and all the more so when the charges were coming from foreigners considered ignorant of Salvadoran realities. As this deeply imbedded cronyism proved virtually impossible for Washington to overcome there was increasing talk in early 1983 about what then-U.S. Ambassador Deane Hinton called "generational change": training virtually an entire new officer corps from the ground up. Salvadoran ninety-day wonders would not only emerge from their training at Fort Benning, Georgia, as better soldiers, they would be transformed overnight, as it were, from Latin American soldiers into North American soldiers.
> Not surprisingly, the Salvadorans are remaining Salvadorans. The U.S.-trained second lieutenants and cadets are carefully watched by their superiors to make sure they conform to the traditions of the Salvadoran, not the United States army.

The most extreme right-wing clique of officers in the army has not only proved impervious to Washington's dictates, it has prospered and become ever more influential. This group, conspicuous for its fascist ideology and peculiarly tight-knit personal relationships, is dominated by Col. Nicolás Carranza and represented most publicly by Constituent Assembly President ex-Major Roberto d'Aubuisson.

This article then continues, Mr. President, by discussing now three prominent military officials, who were extremely close to Mr. D'Aubuisson who were either implicated or allegedly involved with death squads and murderous activity, have been transferred into the diplomatic corps, or went on various training missions. Some went to Chile and others to other parts of the world. After a few months in "exile," they returned to El Salvador. Once again they are now in the front lines of not just the military, but the whole political apparatus. They are again calling the tune in El Salvador.

We are being asked today to support not only those individuals with military aid and assistance, which I think can be argued and debated. We are also being asked to provide a blank check for El Salvador which may elect an individual whose association, identification, career and profession is completely tied to these perpetrators of some of the most gross violations of human rights and killings that we have seen in recent times.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remaining part of that particular page and a half of the book be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the materials was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Three years ago that group appeared to have been squeezed out of any significant role in the army or the nation's politics. Its senior commanders had been removed from positions of authority by then-Defense Minister Garcia after their ties to the death squads had become embarrassingly public and their ultra-rightist ideology made them too intractable to control.

Since former Guardia Nacional Commander Gen. Carlos Eugenio Vides Casanova took over the defense ministry in April 1983, however, those officers have reemerged with more conspicuous power than they ever had before. A key element in their resurgence has been their adoption of Washington's language even as they ignore its principles. They have embraced the ideal of "professionalism," the latest Pentagon buzzword for a "nonpartisan constabulary." Senior U.S. advisers repeatedly have cited them as examples they wish the rest of the Salvadoran officer corps would follow. Yet these golden boys have a persistent way of becoming grave embarrassments; the very model of a modern lieutenant colonel proves either murderous or mutinous or both.

One of the most conspicuous examples is Lt. Col. Jorge Adalberto Cruz, commander of Morazán province. He was among those officers arrested with D'Aubuisson while plotting a coup against the Christian Democratic junta in May 1980. Papers seized with this group suggested links to the death squads and to the assassination a few weeks earlier of San Salvador's archbishop. Shipped off to the Chilean police academy for two years, Cruz is now back in El Salvador commanding the front-line garrison in San Francisco Gotera. In August 1983 he openly denounced El Salvador's political parties, said flatly that his country is not ready for U.S.-style democracy, and named several other commanders in the region as incompetent. As of December 1983, he was still in command in Gotera.

Lt. Col. Mario Denis Morán was head of the Guardia Nacional intelligence unit in December 1980 when four North American churchwomen were killed by members of that security force. When two U.S. labor advisors and the head of the Salvadoran agrarian reform agency were gunned down in the Sheraton Hotel a few weeks later, Morán was there. Although no conclusive evidence has implicated him in the crime, and he reportedly "passed" a lie-detector test, it is suggestive, certainly, that his personal bodyguard and that of his second-in-command have confessed to being the trigger men. After that, Morán spent two years attached to various Salvadoran embassies in South America before Vides Casanova brought him back to command the garrison at Zacatecoluca—the same town, as it happens, where the alleged killers of the nuns are being tried.

The path to professional redemption for these officers was opened up by one of their old classmates, Lt. Col. Sigifredo Ochoa. As acting head of the notorious Treasury Police in the days immediately following the October coup, Ochoa had been implicated in the politically sensitive murder of a sacristan in one of San Salvador's working-class barrios. He was shipped off to diplomatic exile almost immediately. Then on his return to El Salvador he was given command of the rugged, poor, remote and guerrilla-infested province of Cabañas. In less than a year he had "pacified" his territory and established himself not only as the dominant military force, but the political leader of the province. U.S. Military Group Commander Col. John Waghelstein repeatedly lauded him as the most effective departmental commander in the Salvadoran army. But in January 1983, García, apparently irritated with Ochoa's increasing notoriety, and certainly aware of his close personal connections with D'Aubuisson and the ultra-rightists, ordered Ochoa to give up his command once again and accept de facto exile in Uruguay.

Ochoa's reported response was short and simple as he initiated a six-day mutiny that effectively ended García's authority and eventually led to García's removal, throwing the Salvadoran military into the renewed, relentless series of intrigues that increasingly crippled it through the course of the year.

"Obedezco," said Ochoa, "pero no cumplo."

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. How much time have I remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 31 minutes remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. The Senator has made a statement correctly identifying the amounts of money which have been appropriated since 1980 for military aid to El Salvador.

I wonder if the Senator would also agree that in most years, and perhaps every year, the appropriations for El Salvador in economic support funds are also available for military related purposes and the aid funds have not yet been expended as appropriated for this year?

Mr. KENNEDY. The answer is affirmative. The Senator from Montana made that point early in the debate, and I believe it is worthwhile to be observed again during the consideration of this amendment.

Mr. MELCHER. I thank the Senator because I think the point of running out of money for military purposes simply cannot occur because El Salvador has available to it over $100 million not yet expended but to be expended during the next 6 months and which could be used and probably will be used and expended in the coming 6 months for military related purposes.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand the point the Senator has referred to with regard to the economic aid assistance, it is that part of the economic aid assistance is used to pay the salaries of various military personnel in El Salvador. That is one aspect.

I think the Senator is quite correct in raising the question whether the real figure we have been talking about here in the compromise amendment, the figure of $61.7 million, is really the bottom line with regard to military aid.

The Senator is observing that there are parts of the economic assistance program that are directly military related. It may not be the purchase of small arms munitions, but payment of salaries and other expenses. They are absolutely militarily related.

I think the Senator makes a strong point. We are not only looking at this amount of money, $61 million, when we talk about billions in terms of our deficits; though this may not seem like a good deal of money, it is a very substantial amount of money.

As I understand, over 30 percent of the government budget of El Salvador is based on U.S. economic assistance programs.

Mr. KASTEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield for a question.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Senator for yielding. I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Montana to the law. As chairman of the subcommittee, it simply is not legally possible for economic funds to be used for military purposes. I do not think either the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Montana is suggesting this.

I would like to call the Senator's attention to the legislation of the Foreign Relations Act, section 502, section (a). It states:

Amounts appropriated to carry out this chapter shall be available for economic programs only and may not be used for military or paramilitary purposes.

Under those conditions, we are appropriating dollars for economic programs and security assistance programs. I do not have any indication—and maybe the Senator knows something I do not know—I have no indication that the administration is in violation or ever has been in violation of that law. If the Senator is suggesting that, I think he should come forward with the specific example of where economic funds are being used for military purposes. I will say to the Senator I will work with him, and I think the Senator from Hawaii would also, to see that that commingling of funds is not occurring, if the Senator is suggesting that it is occurring.

But the law says that economic funds cannot be used for military or paramilitary purposes. That is why we have found ourselves in the position where we need the emergency military assistance.

Mr. KENNEDY. I know the Senator from Montana wants to comment on this. The real question is: What are military purposes? What are the understandings of military purposes? And what is used in terms of economic aid for the payment of salaries of various Government officials which are directly related to the military function, the military operation?

I believe if there is an examination of that, we will see that there is a significant amount of money provided in economic assistance which is related to the military function.

Mr. MELCHER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. I think it is amusing that we quote from the law that did little more than change the title of the fund. It used to be called security assistance fund. During the time of Vietnam or shortly after, in order to down play the amount of military assistance supplied to foreign countries, we simply changed the title. Economic support fund. But the emphasis is still on security. To the extent that they are utilized to build roads, to build airstrips, to build the infrastructure for the military, they are the very basis of military aid.

To the extent that they are used to pay the salaries of the Government worker, no matter what it is, to replace funds from the Salvadoran Government so they can purchase arms or whatever, it is used to help the military. It is just a question of semantics.

It is a question of semantics and who among us is so naive as not to think that the Salvadoran Government, like other governments we supply these funds to, find that their greatest purpose is their army, their military; that is where those funds end up. And they are available; they are unexpended.

The Senator from North Carolina earlier said, "Well, they may be in the pipeline." What does he mean by that? They are there to be spent for whatever purpose the Salvadoran Government chooses to spend them.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I wish to yield such time as she may desire to the Senator from Kansas.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, it has been with interest over the last couple of days that I have heard the issue of El Salvador debated. Two years ago, I headed our delegation to observe elections in El Salvador for members of the national assembly. I was deeply impressed by observing the more than 1 million people voting, often waiting long hours, in some places under gunfire from guerrilla forces.

A week ago Sunday, a group of my colleagues traveled to El Salvador to observe elections for a new president. Again, they found the people of El Salvador patiently waiting in line to cast their ballots. They too, were impressed.

In both of these elections, I believe the people of El Salvador were delivering a powerful message: They want peace for themselves, for their children and for their nation. This desire cuts across all political parties and all ideologies, except for a relatively small group of guerrillas who not only refused to participate in the elections, but sought to impede the elections both times.

Despite such interference, the elections have gone forward and the people of El Salvador have voted with the hope that they may soon have a government that will pursue a genuine, lasting peace.

It is not clear, either there or here, how such a peace can be achieved, but clearly that is what the people of El Salvador want. That is what the people of the United States want also.

We have now reached a critical stage in the current conflict. With the elections last Sunday and the run-off that will be held next month, El Salvador will elect a President to head their Government for the first time since the war began. These elections give El Salvador at least the veneer of democracy. Whether El Salvador will gain the substance of democracy will depend on the person who wins the Presidency there next month, and what that person does after taking office.

I do not envy the winner of next month's runoff election. With the office of the Presidency will come the responsibility and the duty to fulfill the wishes of the people of El Salvador for peace. The new President's success or failure in meeting that mandate could well decide the future of El Salvador.

The key to success or failure will be the new President's plan to achieve peace and the concrete steps he takes, or tries to take, to make his plans a reality. So far, none of the candidates for the Presidency there has outlined any clear plan for peace.

Even so, I believe that any plan for peace in El Salvador must rest on three key steps that are closely tied.

First and foremost, all activity by the so-called death squads must end. This step is absolutely vital to the future of El Salvador. Without an end to such activities, no government—elected or otherwise—will gain full legitimacy with the Salvadoran people. A government that cannot halt murders in the streets, is in fact not a government.

A continuation of death squad activities will undercut support for the Government both in El Salvador and in the United States, as our own President has made clear. It also will continue to strengthen guerrilla forces opposing the Government.

Second, the Salvadoran Army must demonstrate genuine effectiveness in the war against the guerrillas. By most accounts, the army now is losing ground to the guerrillas. In fact, administration officials suggest that without the emergency aid we now are debating, the army may collapse in short order. That indicates the precarious condition of the Salvadoran Army, even after hundreds of millions of dollars in U.S. aid.

Without an effective army, no government can hope to achieve peace either on the battlefield or at the negotiating table.

Third, with the restoration of civil order and the forging of an effective army, the new Salvadoran President must be ready, willing, and able to engage in discussions with guerrilla leaders to determine whether there is any hope for a peaceful solution to the war.

In the 2 years since I visited El Salvador, I have become deeply pessimistic about events there. Even the most intense pressure from the White House and the Congress has produced only slow and tentative progress on human rights. The possibility of peace seems more distant than ever.

In light of such failures, I have come to believe that even the most well intended U.S. policy there may bear little chance of success. Disasters in San Salvador cannot be corrected in Washington, no matter how much money, arms or even troops we commit to the struggle there.

At this point, my pessimism is tempered by only one small hope. That hope—and it is a fragile one—is that the election of a new president next month may provide a chance for a fresh start for El Salvador. No nation more deserves a fresh start and no nation more desperately needs one. That will happen only if the new president makes it happen.

Given the existence of this small hope, fragile as it may be, it is necessary to support the limited emergency aid of $61 million that has been approved. I do so only as a signal of our support for the people of El Salvador and their desire for peace. The new government must win our support by its own deeds in the coming months. If the new government fails to carry out the mandate of the Salvadoran people, it will not deserve our support.

Mr. President, I wish to say a few words about our covert aid to the rebels now fighting the Sandinista government of Nicaragua. We have in this package a request for a small amount of money to carry us through about 2 more months. It has become, really, a very limited, halting policy. But I believe it is time to phase out and terminate all U.S. aid to the so-called Contras. A failure to terminate this aid will further solidify support for the Sandinistas, both in Nicaragua and in world opinion. It will provide a continuing excuse for the military buildup in Nicaragua and may eventually provide an excuse for even deeper Cuban and Soviet involvement there.

The sole benefit gained from the contras' efforts has been an increased willingness by the Sandinistas to pay lipservice to the idea of regional negotiation. I believe it is time to demand that the Sandinistas match their words with deeds and for us to do the same by engaging in meaningful talks for a regional settlement.

Mr. President, I thank the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for yielding to me.

Mr. INOUYE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized.

Mr. INOUYE. Will the distinguished lady yield?

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. INOUYE. I would feel remiss if I just sat by and did not say a word, because of all the hours we have spent in these past many days debating this issue it is finally the last 6 minutes which have, I believe, most concisely and eloquently focused on what we consider to be the real problem; that whether we like it or not we are in trouble there, and we cannot turn tail and run away. To do that would be inviting what some of us have suggested, a horrendous bloodbath. I commend the Senator.

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Hawaii. I salute his efforts in providing leadership to reach this important agreement. I am happy to lend my support to the efforts of both the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. KASTEN. I, too, thank the Senator from Kansas for her statement in support of the compromise. All of us recognize the difficulties, all of us recognize the problems, but all of us recognize, I believe, the consequences of the failure to act to adopt at last the Inouye compromsie figure. I think anything less would be tragic, not only for the foreign policy of the United States of America but for Central America overall.

I am pleased to yield such time as he may desire to the Senator from Hawaii.

Mr. INOUYE. I thank the Senator very much.

Senator KENNEDY in his usual eloquence has focused upon the possibility of military assistance being provided to Roberto d'Aubuisson and consequently my distinguished colleague has argued that we should wait to see who is elected the President of El Salvador.

Mr. President, I wish to suggest that if we wait until the second round of the election before indicating our support of the electoral process, there may never be a freely elected President of El Salvador. The hotheads in the military may stage a coup d'etat or disrupt the election. Mr. President, I prefer to act now to support the electoral process, to support the recent tentative steps which have been taken toward democracy in El Salvador.

Mr. President, I prefer to act in anticipation that José Napoleon Duarte will be elected President. If he is elected, and the Kennedy amendment is the law of the land, President Duarte's cause would be set back by the interruption of military supplies. What we seek to do today is to keep that supply line open in aniticipation of a favorable outcome to that election.

If we do not act to provide a minimal level of assistance, it will not matter who is elected; the supplies will run out. If, on the other hand, Mr. President, the fears of Senator KENNEDY are realized and Roberto d'Aubuisson is elected President of El Salvador, the flow of supplies can be stopped. We all know that.

So, Mr. President, let us not risk a coup or the end to the electoral process by supporting the Kennedy amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. I wonder if the Senator from Hawaii will yield?

Mr. INOUYE. I would be very happy to yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. First of all, I think all of us in this body are very much aware of the very special contributions which have been made by the Senator from Hawaii in trying to provide a more sensible and responsible policy toward Central America. I recognize this has been an issue in which the Senator from Hawaii as well as the Senator from Kansas have been enormously involved over a period of time.

I am interested in the logic of the Senator from Hawaii when he states that amendments by those of good faith which would terminate military assistance after the election may open up a bloodbath. My amendment, of course, does not do that. It carries on the funding at the same level as in the amendment of the Senator from Hawaii but only until the end of May so we would have another opportunity then to examine this issue.

I am interested in what is the apparent change of position of the Senator from Hawaii from the Appropriations Committee markup when he opposed the military assistance request and was defeated, to his position at the present time. I heard the earlier explanation and it was one which certainly would satisfy me in terms of logic. That is, the Senator from Hawaii thinks that unless he made this particular compromise of $61 million, there would be sufficient votes in this body to get $92 million. I can understand that, and I can count, too. I understand the attempt to bring about a reduction and would therefore defend that position. But I had thought the Senator from Hawaii, in the Appropriations Committee, had actually opposed additional military aid and assistance pending the outcome of the election.

Mr. INOUYE. If the Senator from Massachusetts had checked the RECORD, he would have noted that my amendment called for the postponement of the consideration of this whole package until after the first round—that was Sunday—on the basis that we would like to know what the possible outcome would be. I had no idea what the outcome would be on Wednesday before the election on Sunday.

Second, before bringing up my proposal, I had made a private inquiry among the members of the Appropriations Committee, and it was very apparent to me that if the issue came down to zero funding or a $93 million appropriation, the $93 million request would have easily prevailed.

My suggestion for a postponement was a test case because I thought it is a simple thing just to postpone the consideration for less than a week. Sixteen Senators—more than a majority of the committee—voted against that proposal.

I am convinced that if left to the Senate to decide whether we cut off military assistance or give the full amount, or in the case of the Senator's amendment give the full amount or $21 million, the full amount would prevail. My purpose for proposing this so-called compromise—which is a reduction—was in my small way to try to cut down the level of violence.

Mr. President, I tried to suggest earlier, in the past 4 years, with hardly a whimper, this Congress has gone along developing a military monster in El Salvador. The subcommittee has tried in its own way to set up conditions when no one else was interested in conditions. We established, for example, the 55 limitation on advisers. And when President Carter came up with the first $5.6 million reprograming, I suggested the first condition: If you are going to spend this money in El Salvador, it not be used to purchase lethal military equipment; that it be used for trucks and for ambulances. That was approved by the committee.

It has been a long process. We have tried to cut it down, but we have not been successful. Succeeding Congresses have gone along with the administration. This is the first time we have had this debate, and that is why I indicated earlier I felt it was about time because, as I noted in my response to the Kissinger Commission report, if we are not careful, we may be heading for a tragedy in which our American blood may flow in that part of the world. I would want to see that prevented at all costs.

So, much as I find myself, sadly, in the position of supporting appropriations for military assistance, I am doing this because a realistic appraisal indicates that this is the minimal amount which the administration would accept. I could be on the side of the Senator from Massachusetts and voting against all assistance, but I know that we would lose. So I have to face up to the question: What is better? Going down in flaming glory or coming up with something that the administration will accept? Apparently, the administration accepts the $61,750,000 in my amendment, and it has assured us that it will not use the special authority the President has.

As my dear friend from Massachusetts is well aware, the President could use his special authorities, and, if he wished to do so, he could provide $250 million in military assistance to El Salvador without any further approval by the Congress. If we have this opportunity to stop the administration from doing that and to stop the escalation in the level of violence, I think that is the proper step to take. Moreover, I may be mistaken, but I think that the compromise is a level that will be acceptable here.

If I thought that the $21 million would be the level that would prevail here, I would be on the side of the Senator from Massachusetts, without any hesitation.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Hawaii makes it difficult for me to argue with him or to debate with him this issue. After all, he has been the one in the Appropriations Committee who made the recommendation that we wait for the outcome of the first election. I would like to wait for the outcome of the second runoff. We will then have a clearer idea of the character of the Salvadoran Government.

The Senator from Hawaii points out his belief that with the figure of $61.7 million there will be less killing than there will be under $92.7 million. The Senator has made a very important statement of the reasons he believes that to be so. I certainly agree with him. I further believe that an even more reduced amount would see even less killing.

I ask the Senator from Hawaii this question: He has been closely involved with the development and the escalation of military expenditures in El Salvador for a number of years, going back to the period of the 1980–81 figures. He has seen the $10 million grow to $35 million, and then to $81 million in 1982 and 1983. Now we have seen a threefold increase over 1983 in the request by this administration for military assistance, in its total request for some $243 million, for fiscal year 1984.

Could the Senator from Hawaii share with us his impression of the possible justification for that increase? Does he think it is because there has been a deterioration in the military conditions in El Salvador, or would this request for the money suggest that this administration's policy is going to be used for a dramatic military escalation in El Salvador?

What line of reasoning does the administration or those who support the current policy give to the Senator from Hawaii?

Mr. INOUYE. Obviously, I cannot speak for the administration, as the Senator is well aware, and that is one of the big problems here. None of us is certain as to what the policy is. It would help if we were fully aware as to what the policy of this administration is in Central America.

I believe that the policy is based upon the cold war concept that he who is against communism is our friend. As I have suggested in many speeches I have made over the years, as a result of that concept, we have gotten ourselves into horrendous problems.

Batista came before us and said, "I am your friend because I am against communism," and we opened our doors to him. We knew he was corrupt. We knew he was violent. We knew he was immoral and amoral. Knowing this, with eyes open, because he gave us the proper password, we opened our doors. We should have known, but none of us had the wisdom then that we were in fact acting as a midwife for the birth of Castroism. We should have known, if we were wise, that mankind will not forever tolerate dictatorial abuse. We would have known earlier, had we been wise enough, that supporting Somoza was not in our best interests. But Somoza also had the password. So, it became the patriotic thing here to support anyone who came up and said, I am against the Communists.

However, I think the time has come when we have to change that policy. In the instant case, however, after building up this military monster, if we should decide to either cut funding down drastically or to terminate it completely, I am certain the Senator will agree with me that the hotheads in the military in El Salvador would conclude that in ending military assistance, we have ended the reason for restraint on their part. There would be no pressure; they would take over the show.

What I hate to see repeated is what happended in 1932. I am always reminded of that. In 1932, the military decided, not in the name of anticommunism but because they wanted to run that place, to massacre 30,000 peasants. I do not want that to happen again.

I am hoping—and I may be wrong—that the amount some of us have suggested would be just enough to keep that military in line, would be just enough to give that faint hope of democracy to develop in El Salvador. I am hoping that that amount is just enough not too much and not too little. I sincerely believe that the amount suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts is not enough.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I welcome the analysis the Senator from Hawaii has given in this debate and his knowledge of Central America. He has reviewed with us the stakes of American foreign policy and its identification with Somoza, Batista, and others who I think the Senator from Hawaii said used the password of being anti-Communist.

I wonder, should the winner of this runoff election be Mr. D'Aubuisson, would he not also fall into at least the category that has been identified by the Senator from Hawaii as one who uses the passwork of just being anti-communist and therefore, apparently, expects to receive a blank check from the United States in terms of military aid and assistance?

I wonder whether the Senator from Hawaii would feel if we were debating again aid to Somoza, aid the Batista, we would not have been wiser to have understood the historical teachings and lessons and to tried to have found some alternative rather than identifying the United States so completely with a corrupt regime in Cuba under Democratic and Republican administrations alike? We eventualy saw the result in the emergence of a Communist regime under Mr. Castro. How concerned would the Senator from Hawaii be should he wake up on that Sunday at the end of April or in early May and find out that Mr. D'Aubuisson has been elected and that there are tens of millions of dollars in the pipeline that can be used at his discretion?

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, if I may respond to that by first going back to another question which the Senator asked for clarification, it should be remembered by this body that the proposal I made in the Appropriations Committee was made before the first election.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. INOUYE. When I discussed this matter with Secretary Shultz and with the majority leader, part of the arrangement was to delay consideration of this debate until after the first round in elections. The people in El Salvador are well aware of that arrangement and what has happened here. They know that we waited until the results of the first election were made public to all of us.

The results are now here. Jose Napoleon Duarte received 43.4 percent of the votes. Roberto d'Aubuisson got less than 30 percent. And one can make an educated guess that with those numbers the chances are favorable that Jose Napoleon Duarte will be elected President.

If we cut out the appropriation now or cut it down drastically I am certain the signal we would send back there would be either, one, we are disappointed with Duarte's success or, two, that we will withdraw our assistance irrespective of the outcome of the elections. The signal would be that we are withdrawing our support for the electoral process.

As to the Senator's immediate question, if Roberto d'Aubuisson is elected President of El Salvador and they have millions of dollars of supplies in the pipeline, the Senator and I know that the pipeline can be stopped, and I would be one of the first standing here to act to halt the flow in the military assistance pipeline until we receive a very clear reading on D'Aubuisson's past activities and on what he intends as President.

I am no apologist for D'Aubuisson. I have never met him, but from all I have read he is not the kind of person I would like to see as President of the United States or, for that matter, of any country. Although I am in no way qualified nor capable of prosecuting him for crimes, the evidence that has been presented to us seems rather compelling that he has had some role in the execution and the formation of the death squads. So, if the possibility should happen, I will do all in my power to put a stop to that pipeline.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his comments. I regret that we are on opposite sides on this particular issue, but the Senator's words certainly give me hope that we may yet be on the same side in the future with regard to our military assistance program in El Salvador.

Mr. President, how much time remains?

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, how much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ABDNOR). The Senator from Massachusetts has 12 minutes; the Senator from Wisconsin has 37 minutes.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, may I yield 5 minutes off the bill? As I understand, we agreed to vote by 6:15 p.m. I have not a great deal more to say, but I wish to reserve that time and yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, do I have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I have told the Senator from North Carolina prior to this that I would yield to him roughly 10 minutes. I will do that and then come back to the Senator from Massachusetts and he can yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. EAST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I appreciate this opportunity to speak on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, again realizing we might continue to go over similar terrain we have been over before, but I think at least it tends to deepen the substance of this debate. Therein may lie some merit to it all.

I do agree with what the Senator from Hawaii has said, that I think unless we give this support and give it now and give it promptly the potential for a bloodbath in El Salvador is enormous. Some refer to the so-called death squads and then I also note, as Mr. Duarte has, that the Communist guerrilla forces would be given a green light to take the initiative because it would indicate that the United States no longer has the will to assist and to resist. So the level of violence would increase dramatically and certainly the guerrilla forces, aided and abetted from Nicaragua and Cuba and the Soviet Union, would be a part of that. I think it is important that that be understood.

I am also a little bit troubled with the implication in some of the debate that we should await until the elections are over before we indicate aid levels of support, which sounds to me like dollar diplomacy at its worst, that is, "You are free to have elections in El Salvador, provided they produce the result we want."

Maybe it is not quite as offensive as gunboat diplomacy, but it certainly is sheer, unabashed dollar diplomacy in its rankest form and its most cynical form because what you are saying is to the people of El Salvador: "Now you are free to go ahead and have an election; we are going to attach a condition to it, namely, that you produce the result we want."

Come on. Call that what you will. But it is not democracy. It is dollar diplomacy.

I wish to move to another point here that has caught my eye during this debate.

I agree with Senator KENNEDY when he said at the onset we may very well be involved in the most serious debate that will take place in this Chamber this year, and I think so in the world of foreign policy because what we do here is going to determine the direction this great power takes I think in the near term and the long term as far as the threat we face from the totalitarian left; namely, the Soviet Union via her proxies, not only Cuba and Nicaragua in this case, but Cuban forces in Africa, Syria, the Middle East, and Vietnamese troops in Southeast Asia.

I think when the great leader of the free world has no alternative to offer to its people in its own hemisphere other than being driven into totalitarian submission by the armed ideology, the Moscow-Havana-Nicaragua axis, that is too bad. That is a great default of moral leadership and I think a gross misunderstanding of the political realities of our time.

I think we are repeating the follies of the 1930's in which President Roosevelt had to find every conceivable way he could to aid our allies in Europe against Hitler.

We remember that destroyer deal. We remember all kinds of ways that he attempted to get around a Congress that wanted to retreat into fortress America and retreat into a posture of isolationism and the Chief Executive who has the primary responsibility for American foreign policy in the 1930's had to find ways, he had no choice—Franklin D. Roosevelt did—but to circumvent that, and I think if the U.S. Congress continues to try to micromanage American foreign policy our Presidents, no matter who they are, Democratic or Republican, more liberal or more conservative, will have to find ways simply of working around Congress.

As Thomas Jefferson said, the conduct of foreign policy is "executive altogether." Now, he slightly overstated the case, but I think he had a firm understanding that in the conduct of foreign policy the initiative must belong to the executive branch and we cannot then hold them accountable via the political process.

But when you attempt to micromanage every detail of the conduct of American foreign policy through the U.S. Congress, I think it is a misconception of separation of power, as Montesquieu, and Locke, and Madison understood it, and drives the Executive even further in the direction of having to find ways to deal with what he perceives to be the real and genuine security threats to the United States.

Roosevelt saw that it was Nazi Germany in World War II. Any President we have today, Democrat or Republican, liberal or conservative, in the eighties is going to be faced with the Soviet challenge in the Middle East, in Central America, in Southeast Asia, through her proxies. And to not understand that, I think, is to be naive about the great fundamental geopolitical reality of our time. And I think it is reflected in this debate here.

I might put it another way: Where are the national interests of the United States? We seem to have none, not even in Central America, our own hemisphere. We were told we had none in Southeast Asia. Perhaps some will be saying, in due course, we have none in the Middle East, we have none in Eastern Europe. It is fortress America, it is isolationism.

Only the Soviet Union seems to have national interests—in Afghanistan, in Central America, in Africa, in the Middle East, in Southeast Asia. Whether the U.S. Congress wishes to acknowledge it or not, there is a great protracted struggle going on in the world between the forces of totalitarianism and those trying to resist it. And to miss that point is to miss the most fundamental geopolitical point of our political decade and our political time. And I think it is being missed here in the U.S. Senate and certainly I think it is going to be missed in the U.S. House of Representatives.

If I speak out as one lowly voice, so be it, and one lonely voice, so be it, I am going to say it. We abandon our allies one by one. It was Vietnam and Cambodia. Look at the holocaust there. Will it be Israel next? Europe next? Is there no end to it? Central America now, the bloodbaths follow, as the totalitarian regimes move in. People are desperate to get out, the boat people, and so it goes. Refugees from Europe, from Asia, Central America—our country fills up with them. And what is our response? Do nothing, be impotent, ignore it, play ostrich-like, bury our heads in the sand and abandon our allies one by one.

It is repeating the follies of the thirties. And again, as one lonely voice in this Senate, I want to be in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as protesting as vigorously and as strongly as I can. It is unbecoming to a great power. I find it morally repulsive and repugnant that we do so. I think, geopolitically, we jeopardize the security and the democratic institutions of the people we were sent here to represent.

How many Vietnams can you afford to lose, how many Central Americas can you afford to lose—I ask that question—and ultimately maintain your own freedom? And that was the great issue in the thirties. Hitler marched unchallenged. Mussolini went into Africa unchallenged. The Japanese Imperial Army went into Asia unchallenged and we played fortress America, America first, isolationism in the name of getting us peace. And what did it get us? The worst war we have seen in our history. And history is now repeating itself in the decade of the eighties because the totalitarian left, at that time it was the totalitarian right, but the totalitarian left is moving and is moving through its proxies. If we do not have the will or the vision and the strength to resist it and to give the moral and logistic strength to our allies to resist it, I do not think we deserve to remain free and I do not think we will remain free.

I would like to leave, Mr. President, my colleagues with that thought. I do not know of any issue we have faced in my few tender years in the U.S. Congress that I feel more intensely about.

I appreciate once again the opportunity to speak on this amendment and on the Melcher amendment. I urge their rejection overwhelmingly by a bipartisan coalition in the U.S. Senate. It is the least that we can do.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY). This amendment provides military and medical assistance to El Salvador at the same rate as does the compromise proposal crafted by the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) but for the months of April and May only. The Inouye compromise proposal, as my colleagues are aware, would continue the current level of military effort through the end of this fiscal year—that is September 30.

The Kennedy amendment is based on the belief that the Congress should not approve funds for a Salvadoran Government which has not yet been constituted. It proposes that we provide for a level of funding, designed to maintain the existing level of military activity, for a period to continue until 1 month after the Salvadoran runoff election. Between the election and the end of May we will have an opportunity to consider the results of the election and the progress which the newly elected President is making at furthering human rights, advancing democratic reforms, and conducting the Government's struggle against extremists on the left and right.

It is not for us to favor any candidate in the Salvadoran runoff election. What we all can and do favor is the conduct of a free and fair election, resulting in a government dedicated to furthering democracy and improving the lot of the Salvadoran people. We hope, but cannot yet be assured that the winner of the election will provide the kind of leadership which the situation requires, the Salvadoran people must desire, and the United States seeks. This, to me, is the most compelling reason why we should proceed slowly and decide on our future assistance levels once the government which will receive that assistance has been created, and has given us some preliminary indications as to what it intends to do.

I urge my colleagues to support the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield such time as the Senator from Tennessee may need.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I support the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. KENNEDY. I believe at this time in the history of El Salvador that this is the correct approach for the U.S. Government to take. The Kennedy amendment will provide the Salvadoran Army sufficient funds to assure that there will be enough ammunition and equipment to sustain military operations through the second round of elections and to have the resources to safeguard the balloting that is to come in the latter part of April or early May.

Now, just last month, the President requested $93 million for El Salvador. In making that request, he said that El Salvador is running out of ammunition and that it would be unable to hold secure elections on March 25 unless this request for $93 million was expeditiously approved in an urgent manner.

Shortly thereafter, within really a matter of hours, the chief of staff of the Salvadoran armed services disagreed and was quoted in the New York Times as saying that the Salvadoran armed forces had enough ammunition and supplies to last through the elections on March 25 and to guarantee the security of those elections. And, that prediction by the chief of staff was accurate. El Salvador has now held the first round of elections. The army did not run out of ammunition. There was no shortage of supplies.

Today we are being told that the Salvadoran armed forces need $61 million in military aid. The distinguished Senator from Hawaii has accurately pointed out that these funds would sustain the Salvadoran military at current levels through the end of the fiscal year.

Well, Mr. President, I submit that we do not know who will be in charge of the armed forces of El Salvador in September. Just this past weekend, we saw in neighboring Honduras—a country and a military much more stable than that of El Salvador—we saw the chief of the armed services, General Alveraz, deposed and flown out of the country, and this at a time when the administration was extolling the virtues of the great democracy of the country of Honduras. We learned that the chief of staff, General Alvarez, was relieved of his command, dispatched to Costa Rica, without breakfast, it is reported; three leading members of his staff were deposed, and, only later, civilian authority in that country was informed of this by the Honduran military.

This is the country which is described by the Secretary of State and others in the administration as being a model of Central American democracy, a country where 60 percent of the people are illiterate with a per capita income of $600 a year and the chief killers in that country are gastrointestinal diseases brought about by drinking polluted water that kills a high percentage of the children before they reach 10 years of age.

I submit to my colleagues today that the situation in El Salvador is much less stable than in the country of Honduras. We do not know who will emerge as the victor in the second round of elections. If Mr. Duarte should win, many of us in the Senate would be more likely to support additional military aid for the country of El Salvador. But I am sorry to say today that there are elements in the Salvadoran society, including many in the armed forces, which have publicly stated that they would find Mr. Duarte unacceptable, and there are persistent rumors that, should Mr. Duarte be elected, there would be a coup from the right in El Salvador.

What if Mr. Duarte wins? Even if he should become President, and even if there should not be a coup, we do not know yet if he will be able to take control of the armed forces of El Salvador. We do not know if Duarte would be able to stop the bloodshed of the rightwing terror groups, and those elements of the military who, we are told, have murdered 40,000 civilians in the last 4 years. Mr. President, if Mr. D'Aubuisson, Mr. Duarte's chief rival, is elected, the people of El Salvador will have elected an individual who is reputed to be one of the perpetrators of rightwing terror that has paralyzed this country.

As one Senator, I could not condone, endorse, nor vote for the use of the tax dollars of the people of this country for military aid to a regime that has not demonstrated a basic commitment to justice, or recognized the human rights of all of the citizens of El Salvador.

Mr. President, make no mistake about it, the death squad activity in El Salvador continues. Many of my colleagues returned from that country to report on the success of the elections that took place there just a few days ago. I also am pleased that the elections were successful. But let us not forget that there were successful elections in El Salvador in 1982. Yet, in 1983, the Catholic Church in that country reported that a total of 5,200 civilians were either murdered, disappeared, or otherwise could not be found. To those of my colleagues who say some of this is a result of leftwing terror, I say that is true. Sixty-seven of those deaths were directly attributed to the leftist guerrillas. But, to be sure, leftist murders are just as despicable as rightist murders. But rightwing violence in El Salvador is as much an impediment to freedom and democracy as is the leftist violence. Both, I submit, Mr. President, must cease.

I believe we should provide military aid at this time to El Salvador in sufficient amounts to carry the Salvadoran armed forces through the election period. Following that election, we should reassess. We should not write a blank check. We should wait and see who the new leader of El Salvador is to be. We should see who is in command of the armed forces. We should make a determination about whether there is any connection about who heads that civil government in El Salvador, and what control is exerted over the military in that country. Too often, there is a propensity on the part of many in this country to ascribe to other countries the same political establishment that we have here; that is, that civilian authority is paramount over military authority.

Traditionally, that has not been the case in Central America. As a matter of fact, it has been just the opposite. We should determine whether or not we can support in full conscience whoever is elected to lead that country. Then we should determine whether or not that individual does indeed have the influence and the power to actually have significant say-so over how the government and its armed forces operate.

Mr. President, U.S. military assistance to El Salvador is an important lever that can be exerted to provide pressure to bring about reforms in the Salvadoran military, to bring about pressure to bring an end to the death squads and pressure to bring about justice in the trials of murderers of American citizens. It is almost incomprehensible that over 3 years ago, and some tens of millions of dollars worth of aid later, those who brutally murdered and raped four American nuns have not yet been brought to trial. And those who savagely gunned down and shot to death two American labor advisers in the Sheraton Hotel in San Salvador have not yet been tried and brought to justice.

Mr. President, I believe the Congress does not today have sufficient information to make a proper judgment on the level of funding necessary for the Salvadoran military, and the Kennedy amendment which I support provides sufficient funds to last through the election period. At that point, and based upon the circumstances at the time, the administration should come back to Congress and make a new request. I believe the Kennedy amendment represents a responsible approach to our foreign policy in Central America, and I urge the adoption of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Massachusetts, despite the fact that all of his time has expired, I am prepared to yield back to him a couple of minutes of my time, if in fact, we have an opportunity to debate this particular amendment before the appointed hour of 6:15.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is recommending that the Inouye amendment, which passed the Senate last Thursday, be reduced by nearly two-thirds.

Last week we saw on television news reports masses of Salvadorans either walking long distances and/or standing in line for hours in order to vote in the presidential elections. Even with some of the technical problems which occurred, Sunday's elections can be described as nothing short of spectacularly successful. Now, just a week later to adopt an amendment such as the Senator from Massachusetts is suggesting would be a catastrophic signal to send to all of those Salvadorans who demonstrated on last Sunday that they have chosen democracy. Not only would such an action by the U.S. Congress possibly lead to a military victory by the Marxist guerrillas, but it would certainly erode Salvadoran military morale and fighting capabilities to the point where necessary repair of the harm would take considerable time and resources.

Mr. President, the administration, the majority leader, the minority leader, the chairman and ranking members of the Appropriations Subcommittee have all come to a compromise on a number which we believe is the rock bottom, a minimum needed now for emergency military assistance to El Salvador. If the Senator from Massachusetts amendment is accepted, urgently needed material, replacement equipment, training, and medivac helicopters and ambulances would be denied.

One last point I would like to make is that acceptance of this amendment, which would only provide funds through the end of May, would simply set up another legislative situation and yet another debate. The House has already told us that they will not consider another supplemental until July, and so we would be looking for another piece of legislation on which to attach yet more military assistance.

Mr. President, there have been a lot of numbers thrown around lately about what we have provided El Salvador in the way of assistance. I think it might be worthwhile to lay on the record exactly what we have provided to that country over the last several fiscal years. We have heard numbers ranging up as high as $1.2 billion, and if you go back to 1946, you can just about reach that level.

Total military assistance provided thus far to El Salvador beginning with fiscal year 1978 and through the continuing resolution which was signed by the President on November 14 of last year is $269,500,000. From 1946 to 1977 we provided El Salvador with $16.8 million in military assistance.

For economic assistance, the totals are as follows: Fiscal year 1978 through the fiscal year 1984 continuing resolution Congress provided $819.9 million. The period from 1946 through 1977 we provided $176.7 million in economic assistance.

Mr. President, thus the total in both military and economic assistance for El Salvador for fiscal year 1978 through the latest enacted appropriation is $1,089,400,000. You can top the $1.2 billion figure only when you add in those funds provided from 1946 through 1977.

The main point, however, is that we have only provided El Salvador with $286,300,000 in military assistance since 1946. To those who have been interested in the ratio between economic and military assistance in the fiscal year 1978 through fiscal year 1984 enacted period, military assistance has accounted for 25 percent of our total aid to that country.

I urge the defeat of the Kennedy amendment.

We must adopt the level of assistance which the compromise of the Senator from Hawaii provides.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we temporarily set aside the Kennedy amendment, the pending Kennedy amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2879

(Purpose: To provide additional refugee aid, including $10 million for displaced persons in El Salvador)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) proposes an amendment numbered 2879.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 4, between lines 18 and 19, insert the following:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE

MIGRATION AND REFUGEE ASSISTANCE

For an additional amount for "Migration and Refugee Assistance," $10,000,000: Provided, That such sum shall be available only for assistance to displaced persons in El Salvador.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the human crisis in El Salvador is alarming and America shares responsibility for meeting the challenge. Close to one-half million people are displaced; many live in camps under deplorable conditions. Over 10 percent of El Salvador's population are refugees or displaced persons. These urgent, growing relief needs must be met.

Last September, the Senate adopted an amendment—Kennedy-Simpson—to the State Department authorization bill that earmarked $10 million for displaced persons in El Salvador. The appropriation bill however, did not fully fund the refugee assistance account. In fact, the State Department has submitted a supplemental request for $14.6 million, of which $8 million is intended for El Salvador. I understand that the Department has indicated refugee assistance in Africa will have to be cut back to met needs in El Salvador if this supplemental request is not met.

This amendment provides an appropriation of $10 million to fully fund the El Salvador provision. Otherwise, U.S. refugee programs elsewhere will suffer.

If it is so urgent to get bullets to El Salvador, surely it is no less urgent to get relief to the hundreds of thousands of displaced persons in that country. It takes no sense to pour millions of dollars of military assistance into a goverment that cannot provide basic assistance to its citizens displaced by the conflict for which more military aid is sought.

I urge adoption of this amendment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I will not include in the RECORD the September 1983 staff report on behalf of myself and the Senator from Wyoming, Senator SIMPSON, of the Immigration and Refugee Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. I mention it here, however, for those who are following this debate as being an excellent document. It provides ample justification, for this amendment. It also is a poignant review of the human tragedy in El Salvador.

Mr. President, I would hope that the Senate would accept this amendment. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the amendment being offered by the Senator from Massachusetts would provide an additional appropriation of $10,000,000 for the State Department's refugee programs to be used for activities in El Salvador—specifically assistance to displaced persons.

The Senator knows there is a pending fiscal year 1984 supplemental request which the committee is considering and which will be part of the omnibus supplemental for fiscal year 1984. Included in that request is some $8 million for Latin America, $7 million of which would be specifically for aiding displaced persons in El Salvador.

Mr. President, I checked with the administration, and they say there is no urgent need for this money at this time. State informs me that should any urgent unforeseen needs arise prior to the passage of the omnibus supplemental, the Department would defer some contributions to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in order to meet the needs for displaced persons.

Mr. President, I do not believe it would be inconsistent for us to appropriate the $7 million now. I think it might even be a good idea for us to go forward with a $7 million figure for aid to displaced persons at this time as part of this present legislation.

If the Senator will yield, if the Senator would be willing to modify his amendment to the $7 million figure, I not only would be willing to accept his amendment, but I also would be willing to cosponsor his amendment because these dollars are, I think, in fact, needed.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator for his observation. I would observe as someone who has followed the problems of refugees and the humanitarian needs of peoples in different parts of the world, it always distresses me, whether it was at a time during the Vietnam war or the current time, that there is always an urgency about providing guns and bullets, but never seems an urgency with regard to the humanitarian needs.

I believe the Senator from Wisconsin has made a reasonable recommendation and suggestion, as well as one that I think is realistic in terms of being able to have this amendment accepted.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my amendment be so modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 4, between lines 18 and 19, insert the following:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE

MIGRATION AND REFUGEE ASSISTANCE

For an additional amount for "Migration and Refugee Assistance," $7,000,000: Provided, That such sum shall be available only for assistance to displaced persons in El Salvador.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified.

The amendment (No. 2879), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, do I understand the parliamentary situation to be that my amendment is still set aside? Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

AMENDENT NO. 2840

(Purpose: To require progress on land reform as a condition for U.S. military aid to El Salvador)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendent to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) proposes an amendment numberred 2840.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 3, at the end of line 15, insert the following: "land reform,".

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the bill before us omits any mention of land reform. Amendment No. 2840 remedies this: it adds the requirement of progress toward land reform as an additional condition for U.S. military assistance on which the President must report to the Congress.

The 1981 International Security and Development Cooperation Act declared it should be U.S. policy to support land reform. It required the President to certify that the Government of El Salvador "is making continued progress in implementing essential economic and political reforms, including the land reform program."

The continuing resolution for fiscal year 1984 also required a certification of progress in land reform.

Even the report of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America states:

The pervasiveness and depth of rural poverty make improvement in rural incomes and living standards especially high priorities. Agrarian reform programs should continue to be pursued as a means of achieving this.

Omission of progress in land reform as a condition for American military aid would thus send entirely the wrong signal. Omission would encourage those Salvadoran forces who in recent months have sought to block land reform legislation in the constituent assembly.

The crisis in El Salvador has its roots in social and economic injustice. We must reassert the U.S. commitment to progress in land reform by adopting this amendment.

I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the bill before us has in it some language as conditionality which was essentially extracted from the Kissinger bipartisan report on Central America.

The section that we did pull out does not make specific reference to land reform. At other times, in our Appropriations Committee, we have adopted language urging progress on land reform. The Senator from Hawaii and I have both worked in support of that, so I have no problem with this amendment. On behalf of the committee, I shall be happy to accept the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I have no further need for time on this side, so I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time on this amendment.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2840) was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KASTEN. We have now set aside the original Kennedy amendment and had the adoption of two other amendments. What is the amendment the Senate now has before it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment is pending at this time.

Mr. KENNEDY. I have several other amendments, Mr. President, if the Senator would like. If we have started a trend here, I would like to go into Nicaragua. But I have run out of time at this point, Mr. President. I understand that we have agreed to vote at 6:15.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Kennedy amendment be once more laid before the Senate.

A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KASTEN. Was all time on both sides yielded back on the Kennedy amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was, that is correct.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCHRAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2877

The hour of 6:15 having arrived, under the orders the Senate will vote on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY).

The yeas and nays have not been ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the Kennedy amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO), the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. NICKLES), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), and the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE) would vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who wish to vote?

AMENDMENT NO. 2876

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order there will now be 14 minutes of debate evenly divided on the amendment of the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER).

Who yields time?

Mr. MELCHER and Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, first of all, I assure my colleagues that I doubt whether too much of the 14 minutes need to be used.

I wish to pose a couple questions, and these are questions that people are asking us.

They wonder what we are doing in El Salvador. People are frustrated and particularly at taxpaying time about $200 billion deficits, and they say how much urgent foreign aid is necessary in El Salvador or other parts of the world?

That is what people wonder and they focus on that point and ask how much and why, and then they hear more than they want to hear on arms, insurgents, and killing in El Salvador, and we should refocus our attention on problems at home, like getting a job, education, hospital and doctors' bills, the senior citizens problem, or low agricultural prices. People are frustrated with high interest rates, major industries laying off people, and an imbalance of foreign trade costing us jobs and thwarting our economic recovery.

Mr. President, we have already appropriated over $1 billion for El Salvador. President Reagan would like to make that go to $2 billion this year if Congress and the people go along.

No wonder people are frustrated. Just for this year there is $160 million left unspent for El Salvador. If we do not appropriate one nickel more for them this year, they will have a hard time spending all the $160 million between now and next September 30.

Since all the urgent justification for President Reagan for all this money is to get rid of 10,000 insurgents in El Salvador, it is fair to just divide that out, and that figures to almost $30,000 of money to kill or incapacitate each and every one of the 10,000. Of course, they will not all be eliminated this year, and that is the reason that President Reagan will more than double the ante to provide $70,000 per capita for the 10,000 insurgent demolishment for this coming year.

Our national interest in El Salvador or Central America does not lie in the direction of more armaments but our national interest in Central America is in keeping arms out of these small countries. That means preventing by diplomatic tough work with Cuba and Russia arms shipments into the area, and surveillance and interdiction to keep out all armaments from there. We have sent the armaments that are used on both sides of that killing. Some of the armaments for the army end up arming the 10,000 insurgents.

In El Salvador and Central America democracy does not live on armaments, and that is why I urge restraint on both armaments and money with my amendment.

It is time to change our spending sights for El Salvador and Central America. My amendments does that. And it is enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, as to this amendment, although the total figure is $34 million, I just simply wish to point out to the Senate that because of the way the amendment is written and particularly for the agricultural component of it, only $7.9 million could be applied against the total military needs of $49,250,000.

In a way this amendment is more difficult for the Salvadoran Government. This amendment is more difficult for the administration.

I urge its defeat.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin yields back his time.

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin is correct. It is $7.9 million for arms, $14 million for food aid, and $13.5 million for medical aid, a total of $35.4 million.

Mr. President, that is enough.

I do yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back on the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER). The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from New York (Mr. D'AMATO), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE), and the Senator from Wyoming (Mr. WALLOP) are necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE) would vote "nay."

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. HUDDLESTON), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. METZENBAUM), and the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) are necessarily absent.

AMENDMENT NO. 2838

(Purpose: To condition the provision of military assistance to El Salvador after May 31 to initiation of a prosecution in the case of the two murdered American labor advisers)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts (Senator KENNEDY), I call up amendment No. 2838 which is at the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN), for the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), proposes an amendment numbered 2838.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the section entitled "MILITARY ASSISTANCE" of H.J. Res. 492, add the following: No funds appropriated in this bill or other legislation shall be available for military assistance for the Government of El Salvador after May 31, 1984 unless that government has initiated a prosecution of those involved in the murder of two American Labor advisers in 1981.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, this will be the first order of business tomorrow when the Senate again takes up House Joint Resolution 492. That will be the first amendment. This is the arrangement with the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that immediately following the disposition of amendment No. 2838 the Specter amendment to set aside 30 percent of the funds until a verdict of the nun's case is reached be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, there will be no further rollcall votes tonight, if that has not yet been announced.

AGRICULTURAL PROGRAMS ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1984—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 4072 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4072) to provide for an improved program for wheat, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report will be printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD.)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I urge the Senate to approve the conference report on H.R. 4072, the Agricultural Programs Adjustments Act of 1984. This legislation makes several much-needed farm program changes, which I might add, have been a long time in coming for America's farmers and taxpayers.

The legislation will provide very timely cash-flow and credit assistance to farmers and will reduce the cost of Government farm programs.

H.R. 4072, as passed by the Senate and approved by the conference committee, will freeze the target price for several commodities in 1985 at the 1984 level as sought by President Reagan. The bill targets assistance to producers affected by the devastating 1983 drought and calls for increases in funding for agricultural exports. The increased assistance will go to those farmers who qualify, and the boost in agricultural exports is good for our entire economy.

Mr. President, this legislation is not perfect. I am sure that if each of us had a free hand to write this legislation, we would write these provisions differently. But the legislation is the product of extensive meetings and negotiations, and it represents a strong effort toward a workable compromise which will improve current programs.

Beyond that, this measure will save $2.7 billion from 1984 through 1987, according to official estimates from the Congressional Budget Office. The U.S. Department of Agriculture places the savings even higher, at $3.2 billion over the same period.

Now I know that some people believe that the savings as estimated are overstated, or even nonexistent. I can well understand that view. But the fact remains that we are required by the Congressional Budget Act to use CBO estimates.

Even with the best estimates humanly available, we cannot know if the actual savings will ultimately be $1 billion or $3 billion. There is no perfect crystal ball.

But I do know that we are moving in the right direction, and I believe we should adopt this measure for whatever savings it should produce.

Several of our colleagues in the Senate and House of Representatives played a constructive role in the development of this important legislation. Senator HUDDLESTON deserves particular recognition for his part in the farm credit provisions of this bill. Senator DOLE, of course, initiated the meetings this year which led to this bill due to his interest in the wheat program.

On the House side, Agriculture Committee Chairman DE LA GARZA once again ably provided leadership in representing the views of his members. Congressman TOM FOLEY also played an integral role both in designing a wheat program and then in crafting the necessary compromises to produce legislation which all parties can approve.

I want to be clear: Responsible support for this legislation can be found on both sides of the aisle and in both Houses of Congress.

These Members know that farmer's livelihoods are too important to play politics with, and I commend them for it.

However, as press reports of this conference indicated, there are always those who seek to use these important meetings as a forum to achieve political advantage.

News accounts suggest that a conference might not even have been necessary. I do not know if this is true. I hope it is not. But if it is, it simply means that farmers were deprived of a few more days of much-needed time to use the credit provisions before spring planting.

As I have related, many Senators were helpful—such as Senator JEPSEN who was instrumental in insuring the adoption of several provisions designed to assist farmers hurt by last summer's drought. He has repeatedly stressed the urgency of enacting legislation to help drought-stricken farmers in Iowa and across the Nation, and he worked hard in the negotiations in the Agriculture Committee to get these provisions adopted.

Senator JEPSEN has also shown much leadership in seeking additional funding for agricultural exports. Throughout the process he has sought to develop the best possible programs for Iowa farmers, yet in a framework which can ultimately be approved by Congress and signed by the President.

Mr. President, I shall now describe the agreement reached by the conference committee. The conferees adopted the Senate-passed version of H.R. 4072 in almost every respect.

1984 AND 1985 WHEAT PROGRAMS

The conference agreement will freeze the wheat target price at $4.38 per bushel for both the 1984 and 1985 crops, and will make changes in the 1984 wheat program to increase participation and more effectively reduce grain surpluses. The bill also specifies the 1985 wheat program.

For both the 1984 and 1985 crops of wheat, the bill requires a 10-percent paid diversion and not more than a 20-percent acreage limitation program. The payment rate on the paid diversion would be $2.70 per bushel, the same rate as provided in 1983. The Department of Agriculture would be required to make advance payments of 50 percent of the diversion payments to producers as soon as practicable after signup for the program, a practice which USDA typically has followed in recent years.

The bill also provides for a 10- to 20-percent payment-in-kind diversion program for the 1984 crop with compensation in kind based on 85 percent of the farm program yields, and haying and grazing of acreage diverted from production under the 1984 wheat program at the option of each State.

These changes will improve participation in the wheat program and help to control our burdensome surpluses.

FEED GRAINS

The conferees adopted the Senate provisions relating to feed grains. These include a freeze in the 1985 target price for corn at the 1984 level of $3.03 per bushel—instead of $3.18 per bushel as in current law. The bill also provides that if corn carryover on October 1985, is estimated to exceed 1.1 billion bushels, the Secretary of Agriculture shall provide for a total acreage cutback of 5 to 20 percent—through a combination acreage reduction program and a paid diversion—with not less than 5 percent of the acreage cutback to be achieved through a paid diversion and any reduction over 15 percent to be equally divided between paid diversion and acreage reduction programs. The paid diversion payment rate will be $1.50 per bushel for corn.

The conferees also adopted a provision regarding corn silage. That provision gives the Secretary of Agriculture discretion to make price support loans to producers who cut 1984 or 1985 crop corn for silage on a quantity of other corn equivalent to that corn which would be produced on a field that is similar to the field from which the silage was obtained.

UPLAND COTTON

The conferees basically adopted the Senate provisions with respect to upland cotton with a modification. With respect to the target price for the 1985 crop of upland cotton, the bill freezes the target price at 81 cents per pound—instead of 86 cents as in current law. For the 1985 cotton program, the bill requires that if the Secretary estimates that the carryover level of upland cotton on July 31, 1985, will exceed 3.7 million bales, the Secretary must implement a program for the 1985 crop under which the farm upland cotton acreage would be limited to the farm upland cotton acreage base reduced by not less than 5 percent, consisting of first, a paid diversion of not less than 5 percent with a payment rate of 27.5 cents per pound; and second, at the discretion of the Secretary, an acreage limitation program. Any total acreage reduction in excess of 25 percent of the acreage base for the farm must be accomplished through a paid diversion program.

The conference agreement retains the Senate provision providing for a diversion payment rate of 30 cents per pound if the Secretary estimates that the upland cotton carryover on July 31, 1985, will exceed 4.1 million bales and for a diversion payment rate of 35 cents per pound if the carryover would exceed 4.7 million bales.

RICE

Again, the conferees adopted the Senate provisions with one modification. For the 1985 crop of rice, the bill freezes the target price at $11.90 per hundredweight—instead of $12.40 as in current law.

For the 1985 rice program, the Secretary would be required by the bill to implement a combination acreage limitation program and paid diversion program if the Secretary estimates that the rice carryover on July 31, 1985, will exceed 25 million hundredweight. The diversion payment rate will be $2.70 per hundredweight. If it is estimated that the carryover will exceed 35 million hundredweight, the payment rate will be $3.25 per hundredweight, and if it is estimated the carryover will exceed 42.5 million hundredweight, the payment rate will be $3.50 per hundredweight.

EXPORT ASSISTANCE

The agriculture export provisions of H.R. 4072 were approved by the conference as in the Senate bill with one modification.

The bill includes the Senate provision expressing the sense of Congress that additional actions should be taken to boost farm exports. Such actions include increases in funding for Public Law 480 programs, direct export credit programs, and export credit guarantees.

The conferees also agreed to the Senate provision requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out a 2-year pilot program to use Commodity Credit Corporation dairy products to acquire ultra-high-temperature processed fluid milk for donation to needy persons outside the United States.

The conferees modified the provisions relating to the surplus commodity distribution provisions of the Agricultural Act of 1949. In that case, a compromise was adopted. The House Foreign Affairs Committee shares jurisdiction in the House of Representatives on this provision with the House Agriculture Committee.

The conference agreement amends section 416 to authorize the Secretary to furnish dairy products and wheat acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation for carrying out title II of Public Law 480. Commodities and products furnished under the provision would be for such purposes as are approved by the Secretary, would be furnished under expedited procedures, and could be sold or bartered under certain circumstances, as approved by the Secretary. Agreements are authorized to provide dairy products and wheat in installments over an extended period of time.

As provided in the conference agreement, the Secretary of Agriculture must approve the donations as well as the purposes for which the commodities are being donated. The conference agreement also calls for expedited procedures to be used in implementing the distribution of these commodities.

These provisions are very important. The Secretary of Agriculture has responsibility for the Commodity Credit Corporation which holds title to these stocks. With responsibility for both domestic and international programs, the Secretary can and should play the major role in implementing the commodity distribution.

Expedited procedures for section 416 donations are already in place, and these should continue. The surplus commodity distribution should not become bogged down in the many requirements of title II of Public Law 480. Since enactment of the authority to donate dairy products in 1982, nearly 90,000 tons of surplus stocks have been moved out of Government storage to needy people around the world. USDA deserves much credit for this achievement and I hope this aggressive effort will continue.

EMERGENCY AGRICULTURAL CREDIT ASSISTANCE

Mr. President, the provisions in this bill dealing with agricultural credit are the same as passed by the Senate except for one change in the conflict of interest provision.

As agreed to by the conferees the bill will facilitate the submission of disaster emergency loan applications from farmers whose operations are in counties without disaster declarations, but are contiguous to declared counties. The bill will protect the value of farm assets used for collateral purposes against adverse fluctuations which occur during a major agricultural natural disaster. Also, producers will have an additional 2 months in which to submit disaster loan applications.

The bill will allow producers in counties without a formal disaster declaration but which are contiguous to be declared disaster area, to submit applications to determine eligibility for production loss loans. Of course, these applicants would have to meet the applicable eligibility requirements to receive emergency disaster loans.

Currently, farmers experiencing a crop loss due to a natural disaster have 6 months in which to submit applications to the Farmers Home Administration. Under the bill, this time period will be extended to 8 months. This extension will insure that all farmers have adequate time to evaluate their crop losses and to file the necessary documentation for loan assistance.

The bill will protect the value of farm real estate, equipment and livestock used as collateral for Farmers Home Administration loans against the sharp depreciations which often accompany a massive crop failure. The bill will require that the Secretary value the assets based on the higher of the value of the assets on the day before the Governor of the State in which the farm is located requests assistance under the emergency loan program or the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 for any portion of such State or the value of such assets 1 year before such day.

The bill will require that, with respect to the court-ordered economic emergency loan program operated from December 22, 1983, through September 30, 1984, the Secretary must make at least $310 million in insured economic emergency loan funds available to eligible borrowers during the remainder of this fiscal year. Also, the Secretary may make additional insured obligations totaling not more than $290 million.

The bill will increase the limitation on individual indebtedness under the FmHA farm operating loan program from $100,000 to $200,000 in the case of insured loans and from $200,000 to $400,000 in the case of guaranteed loans. This increase is reflective of the increased annual operating costs in agriculture.

Under current law the repayment period for consolidated or rescheduled FmHA farm operating loans cannot exceed 7 years. Under the bill, this repayment period will be extended to a maximum of 15 years. This additional time will allow FmHA greater flexibility to assist financially troubled borrowers to restructure their debt service to maintain viable operations.

In order to further assist farm borrowers, the bill will require that for insured farm ownership, farm operating, and disaster emergency loans that are deferred, consolidated, rescheduled, or reamortized by FmHA, the interest rate will be the lower of the rate of interest on the original loan or the current rate of interest. This provision will assist FmHA borrowers having difficulty making repayment by allowing an interest rate on rescheduled or consolidated loans at no higher then the original rate of interest.

The bill requires that at least 20 percent of the insured farm ownership and farm operating funds be made available to low income, limited resource borrowers. Furthermore, FmHA farm borrowers must be notified of the limited resource loan programs and how applications may be submitted for such loans. This notification would be accomplished during the normal course of loan making and servicing contact with each borrower.

The conferees agreed to a modification of the Senate provision prohibiting Department of Agriculture officials who review a loan application for the purchase of land from acquiring an interest in such land for a 3-year period. The conference agreement applies this restriction to officers or employees of the Department of Agriculture who review applications for loans to purchase land under the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act, including members of Farmers Home Administration county committees, but not to former members of these county committees if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that the former member acted in good faith in reviewing the loan application. This determination by the Secretary would have to be made prior to the acquisition of the land by the former member.

These credit provisions will assist many FmHA borrowers experiencing difficulty because of last summer's drought or other economic pressures in the agricultural community during the past several years. The enactment of this legislation will provide much needed assistance to these borrowers to avoid liquidation and regain financially stable farm operations.

Mr. President, on a different point, I note that there have been news reports that leaders of the European Economic Community have reached agreement on a package of changes in European farm programs. As I have said before, the structure of internal European farm programs becomes the business of the United States when world markets are distorted by export subsidies on surplus EEC commodities.

While the specifics of the EEC package are not yet entirely clear, I understand that there was agreement for restraint on domestic price supports. Such restraint should help control surplus production, so this step appears to be positive and commendable. In fact, I believe such actions by the EEC would not have occurred without their budget crisis along with the firm stance by the Reagan administration and many of us in Congress.

However, there are also reports that the EEC Commission has been ordered to negotiate with the United States regarding restrictions on corn gluten. Such a development is disappointing.

We remain strongly opposed to limits on corn gluten feed exports. While the United States will honor the GATT, any restrictions are certain to be met with calls for firm countermeasures.

American farmers and others around the world should not have to pay the price for the policies of the EEC. We remain firmly committed to a free and open trading system, even as we make changes in our own domestic programs.

Mr. President, this compromise legislation is important and timely. It gives the Reagan administration another legislative victory, in the form of the target price freeze which they have long sought.

I commend Secretary of Agriculture John R. Block and his entire team for their effort in developing this compromise. Not only will the target price adjustments produce more sound policy, they will generate substantial savings to the taxpayer over time.

This legislation also provides the many other benefits which I have already described. I encourage my colleagues to vote for this conference report in order to seek enactment as soon as possible.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I do not intend to make a long statement on behalf of passage of this legislation. As my colleagues know, there have already been plenty of speeches on the need to improve farm programs and precious little action over the past 15 or 16 months. Suffice it to say that this conference report on H.R. 4072, the Agricultural Programs Adjustment Act of 1983, is almost identical to the Senate version of the bill passed by a 78-to-10 margin on March 22. We had to make a few minor changes in the cotton and rice programs, and gave the Secretary some discretionary authority in the feed grain loan area. But, in large measure, the House conferees were willing to accept the provisions worked out between farm State Senators and the administration in early March.

OUTYEAR SAVINGS

As I mentioned 2 weeks ago, Mr. President, whatever savings this bill may achieve are largely on paper, and are based on some major assumptions of long-range economic performance and policy development. I believe the latest USDA estimate was for about $2.9 billion savings over the fiscal year 1984 through fiscal year 1987 period, while the Congressional Budget Office was at around $2.3 billion. Most of these savings are in the outyears, particularly in fiscal year 1987, and assume escalating target prices for all commodities under the next farm bill for the 1986 crops. I would only point out, however, that these same assumptions are built into the baseline projections for Federal budget deficits. So the savings from this bill are no less real, or no more inflated, than the agriculture component of those outyear deficits.

NOT A POLITICAL GESTURE

I would also take issue with those who claim that this legislation, with mandated advance diversion payments, is a political vehicle aimed at putting money in farmers' pockets before this November's elections. Advance payments have been a common part of several recent farm programs, both in election years and in the off-years. The fact that wheat farmers will be eligible to receive two advance payments this year, one for each of the 1984 and 1985 crops, simply reflects the lateness of our efforts to make needed adjustments in the 1984 program. And no one should blame the administration for not trying to get these adjustments through Congress in 1983, when advance payments would have been less subject to criticism.

A LONG AND DIFFICULT PROCESS

Mr. President, congressonal approval of this conference report will cap a long and difficult process which began nearly 16 months ago. And while we may now be able to go forward with these much-needed changes in farm programs for 1984 and 1985 crops, it appeared at several points that we had reached a permanent impasse. For the record, I would only summarize the more significant events in the development and approval of this legislation.

1982

November. The Reagan administration proposed the payment-in-kind (PIK) program for 1983 crops to reduce heavy grain and cotton production and stocks in exchange for congressional approval of a freeze on target prices at 1983 levels.

December. Congressional efforts to authorize PIK were thwarted by Senator MELCHER, despite the univeral support of his Democratic colleagues.

January. USDA proceded to implement PIK on its own authority. Senators DOLE and DOMENICI introduced S. 18, a bill proposing to reduce scheduled target price increases by one-half and divert proceeds to the agricultural export credit revolving fund.

June. House Agriculture Committee refused to act on the administration's request for a target price freeze. Compromise based on S. 18 was stalled in the Senate Agriculture Committee.

July. Compromise worked out with various farm groups was prevented from consideration on the Senate floor as an amendment to the target price freeze prior to the August recess.

August 9. Faced with August 15 deadline, Agriculture Secretary Block announced details of the 1984 wheat program, including a higher 30 percent acreage reduction requirement to offset the higher scheduled target price.

September and October. Additional efforts to bring the farm compromise to the Senate floor were blocked. Beginning of winter wheat planting required the added participation incentive of a 10-percent paid diversion program.

November 16. House passed wheat version of Senate compromise, sponsored by Congressman TOM FOLEY, only 2 days before congressional adjournment. Further action was postponed until late January.

February 18. Faced with possible low participation in the announced 1984 wheat program, Secretary Block extended the signup period by 3 weeks, until March 16.

March 5-8. Three days of intensive negotiations between administration officials and farm State Senators, resulting in markup of legislation by the Senate Agriculture Committee.

March 22. After another week of postponements and filing of a cloture petition to close off a possible filibuster, Senate passed H.R. 4072, as amended by the Agriculture Committee.

March 29. With minor changes, House and Senate conferees approved the Senate version of H.R. 4072, with final passage of the conference report and signature by President Reagan expected within 2 weeks.

Mr. President, while this chronology may seem somewhat tortuous, it was only through the very considerable efforts of several Members on both sides of the aisle and in both Houses of Congress that we were able to succeed at all. I would particularly note the leadership and patience of the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, Senator HELMS, who guided this legislation through conference in the short space of 1 day.

Another major contribution was made by the senior Senator from Iowa, Senator JEPSEN, who made the total package more attractive and acceptable to feed grain producers by adding provisions expanding credit availability and providing drought assistance. Combined with the export financing increases which the administration was convinced to add to the bill, the Senator from Iowa played a major part in the development of a responsible and balanced bill.

I would also like to express my appreciation for the bipartisan support and cooperation of the senior Democratic member of the House Agriculture Committee, Congressman TOM FOLEY, whose willingness to see the process through can only be characterized as agricultural statemanship.

HOPE FOR IMPROVED PARTICIPATION

Mr. President, I understand that the House may be able to act on this conference report and pass H.R. 4072 either tomorrow or by Thursday of this week, at the latest. We should then be able to get the bill on the President's desk by next week, and the signup period for the 1984 wheat program could be reopened by mid-month. Since Secretary Block has indicated that up to 2 weeks will be needed for signup, the entire process should be wrapped up before May. This would mean that, after all the delays, we may beat the 1984 wheat harvest in Texas by about 2 weeks.

I am hopeful that the improvements in the wheat program will result in a higher level of participation. The USDA indicates that about 38 percent of wheat farmers, representing 53 percent of base wheat acreage, signed up prior to March 16. I would like to see these numbers raised, and to take a little more off of the potential size of this year's crop.

Even with these last-minute changes in the 1984 wheat program, one of the real and positive achievements of the bill is that the major provisions of the next wheat program in 1985 are clearly spelled out. Farmers will know as soon as the bill is signed into law that next year's acreage reduction will include a 10-percent paid diversion within a total requirement of 30 percent. They will know what the loan and target price will be. And, with the remaining details to be announced no later than July 1, they will be able to make their production plans well in advance of fall planting for the first time in years.

I firmly believe that this early clarification of program provisions will do more than anything else to raise participation and increase farmer support for the goals of the Government's program.

A POSITIVE CLIMATE FOR 1985 LEGISLATION

Finally, Mr. President, I would only mention what I see to be the true saving grace of this legislation: that its passage, even at this late date, demonstrates a renewed will and ability of both Congress and the administration to overcome obstacles and work out compromises on farm programs. We spent all of last year and part of this year stymied by a small minority in the Senate who would not even allow us to consider and vote on this bill.

The fact that we were finally able to insist on carrying out our responsibilities will relieve a lot of pressure that had built up on the whole policymaking framework for agriculture. And it will make it a lot easier for us to take a positive approach to the development and passage of new and hopefully more long-term farm legislation next year.

Thank you, Mr. President.

(By request of Mr. BYRD, the following statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:)

● Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, under the conference report on H.R. 4072, adjustments will be more in the wheat, feed grain, upland cotton, and rice programs, and much-needed credit assistance will be provided to our Nation's farmers. The legislation is needed to make the farm programs more effective and reduce outlays under those programs.

Also, the conference report contains provisions designed to expand surplus disposal programs through export donations; and it expresses the sense of Congress that action should be taken to make additional funds and lending authorizations available in fiscal year 1984 and 1985 to strengthen U.S. agricultural export markets. We must increase our agricultural exports if our Nation's farmers are to share in the economic recovery, and the export initiatives contained in the conference report will do much to accomplish this.

In this regard, I was pleased to join with Senator COCHRAN and others, last Friday, in proposing two amendments to House Joint Resolution 492, the pending appropriations legislation, to provide a major portion of the additional export funding and lending authorization called for in H.R. 4072. The Senate adopted both amendments.

I urge the Senate to approve the conference report.

PURPOSE OF THE LEGISLATION

The conference report addresses the high costs of the farm programs while making improvements in the programs to increase producer participation. In addition, the conference report includes a number of provisions that will eliminate deficiencies in the Federal farm credit programs.

The conference report makes no changes in the 1984 commodity programs, except for changes in the wheat program that are supported by producers, and counterbalances target price freezes in 1985 with authority for paid diversion programs. With this approach, farmers will be able to better plan for next year's crops and this year's plantings will not be unduly disrupted.

The target prices specified under existing law were established at a time, in 1981, when production costs were escalating rapidly and those rapid yearly increases were expected to continue. Price inflation has moderated, and the target price levels should be adjusted to reflect that fact.

I believe the changes in the target prices proposed in the conference reports on H.R. 4072 will reduce costs under the commodity programs without reducing their effectiveness for farmers.

CREDIT ASSISTANCE

The provisions of the conference report that will provide our farmers significant credit assistance are key components of this legislation. Many of the credit provisions are proposals that I developed and included in legislation introduced last year—S. 24 and S. 1949.

Credit remains a serious problem for farmers, and the threat of foreclosure is the most demoralizing aspect of the recession in the agricultural economy.

During the last 2 years, over 15,000 farmers with Farmers Home Administration loans have been forced to liquidate their operations for financial reasons.

Federal credit programs need to be adjusted immediately to prevent additional foreclosures against farm operations who are experiencing temporary financial difficulty through no fault of their own.

The credit portion of the conference report addresses this issue in several ways.

It specifically requires the Department of Agriculture to make the natural disaster emergency loan program available to farmers not now being assisted by that program.

Although the law already contains broad eligibility criteria that require FmHA to make natural disaster emergency loans available based on individual production losses without regard to county disaster designations, the Farmers Home Administration continues to use the county designation system, a system that effectively withholds assistance from some eligible farmers.

The conference report addresses the administrative aspects of this matter by requiring the Farmers Home Administration—if the agency continues, for administrative purposes, to use the county designation procedures rather than consider individual applications on a case-by-case basis—to make emergency loans available based on individual losses to persons in counties contiguous to designated counties.

I will point out that Congress amended the law in 1978 to make natural disaster emergency loans available based on individual losses regardless of whether or not a farmer lives in a designated county. The conference report does not alter the revisions made in 1978. Therefore, nothing in the conference report should be construed as limiting access to the program by individual farmers, regardless of where they reside.

The conference report makes other improvements in the natural disaster emergency loan program and mandates the immediate allocation of an additional $253 million in funding for the economic emergency direct loan program.

Following the decision of the committee of conference last Thursday on the economic emergency program, the administration decided to authorize more direct loans without waiting for passage of this legislation. So, on Friday, the Department of Agriculture released the additional $253 million for economic emergency insured loans called for in the bill. I am pleased that the administration has acted quickly to respond to the conferees' action, but I want to stress that the $253 million in additional direct loan funds bill is a minimum. I believe that, by the time all the applications are processed, it may become clear that out Nation's farmers will need more than that amount.

If so, under the conference report, there is clear authority for the Department of Agriculture to make additional direct economic emergency loans up to the total amount of lending available under the program. I expect the Department of Agriculture to use the authority for additional direct loans, if necessary, to achieve the goals of the program. The $253 million for direct loans is a minimum, not a maximum.

I wish to point out that direct economic emergency loans are repaid at an interest rate that is above the Federal cost of borrowing so there is very little cost, but great benefit to farmers, in the making of such loans. Over 121,000 economic emergency loans have been made in past years and conditions justify reopening the direct loan program immediately.

The conference report also makes improvements in the FmHA farm operating loan program and insures better credit terms for farmers forced to reamortize or reschedule their FmHA farm loans.

Under the provisions of the conference report, FmHA farm loans will be rescheduled or reamortized at the current or original rate of interest, whichever is lower. There, no doubt, will be cases in which loans with different interest rates are consolidated. In those cases, I would expect the agency to consider blending the interest rates, taking into account the outstanding principal of each loan to be consolidated. Such blending would seem to be an appropriate way to deal with the interest rate differential.

Finally, the conference report will require the Farmers Home Administration to make loans available under the low-income, limited-resource farmer programs. The purpose of this provision is to insure that the Farmers Home Administration fully uses the funds allocated for these programs.

To facilitate this, the Farmers Home Administration will be required to take steps to notify borrowers of the availability of these programs. Press releases, signs in county offices, inserts into scheduled mailings and servicing notices, and individual meetings with borrowers are all appropriate ways for the Farmers Home Administration to provide notification to borrowers of the existence of these programs. In any case, the purpose of the notification provisions is to insure that all Farmers Home Administration farm borrowers, as well as new applicants, be given the opportunity to participate in the limited-resource farmer programs if they qualify.

COMMODITY PROGRAMS

The provisions of the conference report would adjust the target price of wheat for both the 1984 and 1985 crops. For the 1985 crops of feed grains, upland cotton, and rice, target prices would be held at the same level as provided in current law for the 1984 crops.

The conference report establishes the target price for wheat at $4.38 per bushel for both the 1984 and 1985 crops. Without enactment of this legislation, the target price for wheat would rise to $4.65 per bushel next year—more than $1 a bushel above projected market prices.

Because of the substantial excess supply of wheat in prospect with respect to both the 1984 and 1985 crops, the conference report directs the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a paid land diversion program in conjunction with an acreage limitation program for both years. The smaller harvest of wheat under the acreage reduction programs can lead to higher market prices and lower Federal outlays.

The conference report changes the terms of the acreage reduction program for the 1984 crop of wheat previously announced by the administration. The announced program requires that 30 percent of a participating farmer's base acreage be diverted from production without compensation. Under the conference report, up to 30 percent of the farm base acreage must be diverted from production in 1984, but the farmer would receive compensation for 10 percent of the base acreage diverted.

For 1985, participating wheat farmers will have to limit their plantings of wheat to the acreage base for the farm reduced by a total of up to 30 percent—up to 20 percent unpaid and 10 percent paid.

For both crops, one-half the diversion payment would be made to the farmer as soon as practicable after the diversion contract is signed. The diversion payment rate—for both the 1984 and 1985 crops of wheat—will be not less than $2.70 per bushel.

The target prices for the 1985 crops of feed grains, upland cotton, and rice will be set at the levels established for the 1984 crops—$3.03 per bushel of corn, $11.90 per hundredweight of rice, and 81 cents per pound of upland cotton.

There could be acreage reduction programs for the 1985 crops of these commodities depending on the estimated ending inventories—the carryover stocks—of these commodities after the 1984 crops are marketed. If estimated stocks will be excessive, acreage reduction programs, including paid diversions, will be put in place for participating producers.

The 1985 feed grain program must include at least a 5-percent paid diversion if carryover stocks of corn are estimated by the Secretary of Agriculture to exceed 1.1 billion bushels at the end of the 1984 marketing year. The Secretary could also require that up to 10 percent of each farmer's feed grain base acreage be diverted from production without payment. If the Secretary determines that more acreage must be diverted, he could require that an additional 5 percent of each participating farmer's base acreage be set aside from production. The acreage set-aside in excess of 15 percent must be equal parts paid and unpaid. The diversion payment rate for corn will be not less than $1.50 per bushel.

The carryover trigger levels are 3.7 million bales for cotton and 25 million hundredweight for rice.

If the cotton trigger level is reached, the upland cotton program for 1985 would include an acreage reduction provision under which at least 5 percent of each participating farmer's base acreage would be diverted from production under a paid diversion, and up to an additional 20 percent could be required to be set aside under an unpaid diversion program. Any reduction in excess of 25 percent of a farmer's acreage base would be through a paid diversion program.

The minimum diversion payment rate would depend on the upland cotton carryover level. If it is over 4.7 million bales, the minimum rate will be 35 cents per pound; if the carryover is less than that, but over 4.1 million bales, the minimum rate will be 30 cents per pound; and if the carryover is more than 3.7 million bales, but not more than 4.1 million bales, the minimum rate will be 27.5 cents per pound.

If the rice trigger level is reached, the rice program for 1985 would include an acreage reduction provision under which at least 25 percent of each participating farmer's base acreage would be diverted from production, with at least 5 percent a paid diversion.

The minimum diversion payment rate for rice would depend on the rice carryover level. If rice carryover exceeds 42.5 million hundredweight, the minimum rate would be $3.50 per hundredweight; if the carryover is less than that but more than 35 million hundredweight, the minimum rate would be $3.25 per hundredweight; and if the carryover is more than 25 million hundredweight but not more than 35 million hundredweight, the minimum rate will be $2.70 per hundredweight.

AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS

The administration has agreed to take several actions to expand overseas use of U.S. agricultural products, as a complement to the commodity provisions of this legislation. These steps are described in the conference report, and the sense of Congress is expressed that they should be taken.

The additional allocation of export credit guarantees will be $500 million in fiscal year 1984 and $1.1 billion in fiscal year 1985. This additional allocation for agricultural export credit guarantees will bring the total available in fiscal year 1984 to more than $4.5 billion and will set the fiscal year 1985 level at $4.1 billion. These higher program levels have been advocated by many farm groups who argue that adequate export credit guarantees must be available if the United States is to maintain foreign markets.

Also, as described in the conference report, the administration will use an additional $100 million in fiscal year 1985 for direct agricultural export credits. Such direct export credits have been used in the blended credit program of the past 2 years. The added direct credits could be used for blended credit or for other purposes, such as an intermediate-term credit program that would extend the payback period for loans.

Further, the administration will support additional funding for the Food-for-Peace (Public Law 480) program. The additional funding will amount to $150 million in fiscal year 1984 and $175 million in fiscal year 1985.

The conference report provides for the establishment of a 2-year pilot program under which the Commodity Credit Corporation will use surplus dairy products to acquire, through barter or exchange, 40,000 metric tons of ultrahigh temperature processed fluid milk for donation to needy persons outside the United States.

Under the conference report, the Secretary of Agriculture will be given authority under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 to donate wheat—as he now can donate dairy products—to needy persons in foreign countries. Also, the donated commodities could be bartered or sold, with the proceeds to be used for activities consistent with providing food assistance to needy people. Commodities could be donated through title II of Public Law 480 under expedited procedures. The donated commodities could be provided under multiyear agreements; and the Commodity Credit Corporation would be authorized to pay transportation, reprocessing, packaging, and similar costs associated with such donations.

SOIL AND WATER RESOURCE CONSERVATION

I am disappointed that the conferees did not take advantage of an opportunity to strengthen this legislation by accepting a very modest conservation proposal offered by Congressman ED JONES and supported by the House conferees.

Congressman JONES' conservation proposal consisted of three provisions. The first and most significant provision was what is referred to as the sodbuster initiative. A number of persons have advocated this initiative and the Senate has already approved similar legislation.

The second provision would require the Department of Agriculture to conduct a feasibility study of a program under which farmers who voluntarily set aside cropland may qualify to have such cropland maintained in their normal acreage base for purposes of eligibility under future farm programs.

The third provision would authorize a $25 million conservation reserve program under which highly erodible cropland could be put into long-term conservation uses.

It is all too easy to talk about the importance of addressing our Nation's soil and water conservation programs but very few besides Congressman JONES have developed innovative and realistic approaches to protecting our Nation's most valuable asset.

I commend Congressman JONES for his leadership on this issue.

CONCLUSION

H.R. 4072 will make needed adjustments in programs of vital importance to our Nation's farmers. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the adoption of the conference report.●

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I rise in support of final passage of H.R. 4072, the Agricultural Programs Adjustment Act of 1984. Almost 11 months ago, we began to discuss the 1984 wheat program. Finally, we have produced a bill which can get through both Houses of Congress and can be enacted into law. It is imperative that we enact this legislation immediately. Farmers in my home State of Oklahoma will be harvesting their 1984 crop wheat in another month and a half. Farmers needed to know last year whether they were going to be allowed haying and grazing on set-aside acres past the cutoff date. We must not wait any longer to get this legislation enacted.

While this legislation is not perfect, it will prevent the situation from deteriorating any further. I urge my colleagues to support this vital legislation.●

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

Engen to the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration. Mr. Engen's appointment to, acceptance of, and service in that Office shall in no way affect the status, rank, and grade which he now holds as an officer on the retired list of the United States Navy, or any emolument, perquisite, right, privilege, or benefit incident to or arising out of any such status, office, rank, or grade, except to the extent that the Act of August 19, 1964, Public Law 88-448 (the Dual Compensation Act), as amended (5 U.S.C. 5531, et seq.), affects the amount of retired pay to which he is entitled by law during his service in the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration. So long as he holds the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration, Mr. Engen shall receive the compensation of that Office at the rate which would be applicable if he were not an officer on the retired list of the United States Navy, and shall retain the status, rank, and grade which he now holds as an officer on the retired list of the United States Navy, and shall retain all emoluments, perquisites, rights, privileges, and benefits incident to or arising out of such status, and office, rank, or grade, and shall in addition continue to receive the retired pay to which he is entitled by law, subject to the provisions of the Dual Compensation Act, as amended.

SEC. 2. In the performance of his duties as Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration, Mr. Engen shall be subject to no supervision, control, restriction, or prohibition (military or otherwise) other than would be operative with respect to him if he were not an officer on the retired list of the United States Navy.

SEC. 3. It is hereby expressed as the intent of the Congress that the authority granted by this Act is not to be construed as approval by the Congress of continuing appointments of military persons to the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration in the future.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

"A RESOLUTION

"Whereas, the College of Micronesia was designated a land-grant college by the United States Higher Education Act of 1980 (United States Public Law No. 96-374); and

"Whereas, in lieu of the College of Micronesia receiving federal land from the United States Congress in the said law authorized an appropriation of $3 million to be placed in a trust fund as an endowment for the College of Micronesia, with the interest from such trust fund to be available to the College of Micronesia for its various programs and projects related to agriculture and other permitted fields of study; and

"Whereas, the College of Micronesia has entered into a Memorandum of Understanding with the United States Department of Agriculture regarding extension services in agriculture and home economics in Micronesia pursuant to the Smith-Lever Act and other applicable laws; and

"Whereas, the College of Micronesia Cooperative Extension Service has entered into a Project Agreement with the Extension Service of the United States Department of Agriculture regarding the organization and administration of the Cooperative Extension Program pursuant to the Smith-Lever Act and other applicable laws; and

"Whereas, the College of Micronesia has established an Agricultural Experiment Station; and

"Whereas, the College of Micronesia has established a College of Tropical Agriculture and Sciences; and

"Whereas, it is the sense of the Nitijela that the College of Micronesia has done all that it has been requested to do so as a result of its designation as a land-grant college; now therefore

Be it resolved, by the People of the Marshall Islands, through their Nitijela in its 5th Constitutional Regular Session, 1984, that the Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture, the Secretary of the United States Department of Education, the Secretary of the United States Department of Interior, and the United States Congress be hereby respectfully requested to take all steps necessary to expedite the appropriation of the $3 million authorized by the United States Higher Education Act of 1980 to be used as an endowment for the College of Micronesia as a land-grant college; and

"Be it further resolved that the Speaker transmit certified copies of this Resolution to the Secretry of the United States Department of Agriculture; to the Secretary of the United States Department of Education; to the Secretary of the United States Department of the Interior; to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the following Congressmen: Donald E. POM-578. Joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Appropriations.

"RESOLUTION

"Whereas, Title II of the Federal Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-608) authorized the United States Secretary of the Interior to make grants to Indian tribes and organizations for the establishment and operation of Indian child and family service programs; and

"Whereas, More than 201,000 American Indians, a larger number than in any other state, are residents of California, and the state includes approximately 82 federally recognized Indian tribes; and

"Whereas, California's share of funds made available under Title II of the Indian Child Welfare Act has substantially decreased over the past three fiscal years; and in fiscal year 1982 the allocation of these funds to Indian people in California was decreased by 40 percent when the total appropriation for the act was only decreased by 4 percent; and

"Whereas, In fiscal year 1984 California's appropriation was again decreased, and in fiscal year 1985 the United States Bureau of Indian Affairs is proposing to further reduce funding despite the documented need for the program services provided by the federal act; and

"Whereas, This decrease is based on the decision to discontinue the provisions of grants to off-reservation programs, although these programs are important to urban as well as to rural residents because other services are not tailored to the special needs of Indians; and

"Whereas, The United States Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs, pursuant to the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, has recommended that the Indian Child Welfare Program be continued both on and off the reservation with an increase in funding from the present $8.7 million to $12 million; and

"Whereas, To again reduce California's allocations of funds under Title II would result in the loss of important child welfare and social services and inflict a serious injustice on the Indian population of this state; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California respectfully memorializes the President and the Congress of the United States to increase the appropriation for Title II of the Indian Child Welfare Act of 1978 to $12 million as recommended by the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs, in order to more adequately meet the needs of American Indians in California and throughout the nation, and to continue funding of all Title II programs both on and off the reservation; and be it further

"Resolved, That the President and the Congress of the United States direct the Bureau of Indian Affairs to restore to the Indian people in California an equitable share of funding under Title II based upon population and need and the supplemental hearings be held to increase California's allocation of Title II funds for fiscal year 1985; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit copies of this resolution to the Preident and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

POM-579. A resolution adopted by the Governors of the Thirteen Appalachian States relating to the FY 1985 Appalachian Regional Commission budget proposal recently transmitted to Congress by Governor Harry Hughes of Maryland; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

POM-580. A resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Washington; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

"SENATE RESOLUTION 1984-129

"Whereas, Grays Harbor is the State of Washington's only deep water port on the outer coast; and

"Whereas, The navigation channel serving the maritime interests in the Port of Grays Harbor is an important part of Washington State's transportation system, which includes highway and rail, as well as water; and

"Whereas, The Grays Harbor navigation channel is a vital link in the transport of products from private, state, and federal forests, to foreign markets; and

"Whereas, Grays Harbor continues to be a major transshipment center for forest products to Japan, Korea, and the People's Republic of China. In fact, in 1983 Grays Harbor shipped the largest volume of forest products to mainland China of any United States port; and

"Whereas, With the existing landside transportation system, including two mainline railroads and major state highways, the Grays Harbor navigation channel can play an even more important role in the future through expanded shipment of commodities from throughout the western half of the United States; and

"Whereas, In this total regard, the Grays Harbor navigation channel together with its routine maintenance and periodic improvements are critical to the economy of multiple counties in southwestern Washington State and, potentially, to multiple states throughout the western United States; and

"Whereas, In order for Gradys Harbor to remain a viable seaport, the navigation facilities must be able to serve increasingly larger, more economical vessels; and

"Whereas, On July 9, 1965, the port of Grays Harbor requested that a study of the feasibility of widening and deepening the Grays Harbor navigation channel be undertaken by the United States Army Corps of Engineers; and

"Whereas, The United States Army Corps of Engineers has completed the feasibility study and final environmental impact statement on the proposal to widen and deepen the Grays Harbor navigation channel from −30 feet to −38 feet; and

"Whereas, Both of these reports were carefully reviewed and approved by the United States Corps of Engineers' board of engineers for rivers and harbors on December 14, 1982; and

"Whereas, The Department of the Army, Office of the Chief of Engineers has yet to act on the board of engineers' recommendation for approval of the Grays Harbor navigation improvement project;

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, By the Senate of the State of Washington, That Congress is requested to take action to move the Grays Harbor navigation improvement project forward by requiring the Secretary of the Army to deliver to the Congress any and all studies, reports, and conclusions regarding the Grays Harbor project, and that Congress enact appropriate laws instructing the United States Army Corps of Engineers to proceed as expeditiously as practicable with the final engineering, design, and construction of the Grays Harbor navigation improvement project; and

"Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be immediately transmitted to the Honorable Ronald Reagan, President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each member of Congress from the State of Washington."

POM-582. Joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Finance.

"SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL NO. 107

"We, your Memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Idaho assembled in the Second Regular Session of the Forty-seventh Idaho Legislature, do hereby respectfully represent that:

"Whereas, the United States sheep industry has been an integral historic part of the agricultural economy of Idaho and of the nation; and

"Whereas, the United States stock sheep industry, as of January 1, 1984, has the lowest number of sheep since estimates were started in 1867, with Idaho's sheep population showing a similar decline from 2.3 million head in 1920 to 355,000 head in 1984; and

"Whereas, the sheep industry contributes substantially to the American economy and to production of food and fiber; and

"Whereas, the sheep industry, which is nonpolluting and utilizes a rapidly renewing resource, is in grave danger of collapse due to problems, of which one notable problem is the lack of control of foreign lamb imports during key periods into key areas of the United States; and

"Whereas, the other major and minor domestically produced red meats, especially beef, veal, mutton and goat meat, are protected by congressionally mandated import quotas; and

"Whereas, the sheep industry of this country cannot stand another year of breaking the lamb market with excessive dumping of subsidized New Zealand lamb cuts during key periods in key American markets, which unfairly compete with domestic lamb sales; and

"Whereas, it has been reported that New Zealand is deliberately and cleverly analyzing our domestic sheep industry and market so as to cause weakening.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved, By members of the Second Regular Session of the Forty-seventh Idaho Legislature, the Senate and the House of Representatives concurring therein, that for the immediate future, the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States, direct the United States Department of Commerce to intervene immediately to petition the International Trade Commission to cause New Zealand to forthwith cease and desist the dumping of lamb cuts stored in freezer lockers in this country on key American markets during key periods, causing a devastating impact on the domestic market such as occurred in the spring and summer of 1983.

"Be it further resolved That the United States Congress is hereby urged to pass import quota legislation dealing with lamb specifically, which would effectively protect the sheep industry of Idaho and the nation from the indiscriminate importation and/or dumping of foreign produced lamb into this nation's wholesale and retail markets.

"Be it further resolved That the Secretary of the Senate be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward copies of this Memorial to the President of the United States, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Agriculture, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, the Chairman of the Senate Agriculture and House Agriculture Committees in Congess, the congressional delegation representating the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States, the Chairman of the International Trade Commission, and to the Governors of the western states."

"ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 1

"Whereas the Province of Taiwan is of great strategic importance in the defense of East Asia and the Pacific; and

"Whereas the people of Taiwan are and have been among the most trusted friends of the people of the United States; and

"Whereas the commercial, cultural and other nongovernnmental relations between the American people and Taiwan are now and have always been excellent and mutually beneficial; and

"Whereas the people of Wyoming wish to conduct and carry out numerous economic and cultural programs, transactions and other relations with the people of Taiwan; and

"Whereas Wyoming products are continually essential for maintaining the trade patterns which are developing between the United States and Taiwan; and

"Whereas the Legislature has strong reason to believe that it is the will and pleasure of the people of this State that Taiwan be adopted as a sister state.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the members of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming:

"SECTION 1. The Province of Taiwan is hereby adopted as Wyoming's sister state.

"SEC. 2. The Legislative Service Office shall forward a copy of this Resolution to the President of the United States of America, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Chief Executive Officer of the Government of the Province of Taiwan and to the Speaker of the Provincial Legislature of Taiwan."

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana,

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. For purposes of representation in the Congress, election of the President and Vice President, and article V of this Constitution, the District constituting the seat of government of the United States shall be treated as though it were a State.

"SEC. 2. The exercise of the rights and powers conferred under this article shall be by the people of the District constituting the seat of government, and as shall be provided by the Congress.

"SEC. 3. The twenty-third article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

"Whereas, The western Pennsylvania community of McKeesport is also trying to control and correct an outbreak of giardiasis; and

"Whereas, Control and correction of giardia-infested water supplies could be aided greatly by Environmental Protection Agency intervention; and

"Whereas, The EPA has not intervened because it does not recognize giardia as a water pollutant; therefore be it

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the presiding officers of each house of Congress and to each member of Congress from Pennsylvania."

POM-593. A resolution adopted by the house of representatives of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

"ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION No. 3

"Whereas, recent scientific studies suggest a direct relationship between man-made sulphur dioxide air emissions and acid rain, and these studies have been limited to the Midwest and Northeast regions of the country; and

"Whereas, Congress is considering H.R. 3400 which mandates the high-cost control method to the exclusion of other, less costly strategies and proposes to spread the costs of these controls nationwide through a tax on consumers of all nonnuclear electricity; and

"Whereas, this legislation would force western electricity rate payers, who in many cases are already paying for technological emission controls based upon standards developed for eastern coal; and

"Whereas, under this legislation, electricity consumers in the west would pay disproportionately more into the acid rain control program than will consumers in the midwest and the east; and

"Whereas, a reasonable, cost-effective acid rain control program should be designed to protect both the consumer and producer; and

"Whereas, the state of Wyoming fully supports the goal of improved air quality without severe restrictions on economic growth;

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the members of the legislature of the State of Wyoming:

"SECTION 1. That the legislature supports and recommends consideration of an acid rain control program which:

"(a) Achieves early, but cost-effective emission reductions at the most obvious sources without mandating specific technological controls, and encourage continued research and development of the most cost-effective long-term solutions to the acid rain problem; and

"(b) Allocates the cost of the solution to those primarily responsible for the problem. Legislation should credit rather than penalize states, utilities and their consumers which have already reduced emissions.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of State forward copies of this resolution to: the President of the United States; the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress; each member of Wyoming's congressional delegation; and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ABDNOR:

S. 2516. A bill to provide for a graduated reduction of the budget deficit of the Federal Government; pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DEFICIT REDUCTION ACT

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. President, the current budget situation, with annual deficits projected to run about $180 billion for the next several years under even relatively optimistic economic assumptions, should cause every Member of Congress great concern.

Unless those deficits can be reduced dramatically, Government demands for credit will continue to crowd out private borrowing to an ever-increasing extent. The result will be high interest rates escalating even higher, and a general slowing of the economy. Huge budget deficits are also a major factor contributing to current record trade deficits. By keeping the dollar overvalued relative to foreign currencies, we are, in effect, giving a tremendous subsidy to foreign industry at the direct expense of our own industrial and agricultural sectors.

The situation demands action and demands it now. We simply cannot afford to wait. Last year we spent nearly $90 billion on interest; this year it is going to be over $100 billion. The situation is seriously deteriorating and unless we take immediate action, compounding interest costs are going to push us beyond the point of no return.

During the last couple of years, we have seen a real turnaround in the economy. Inflation is way down. From a 1979 high over 13 percent, the 1983 was 3.8 percent, the lowest since 1972. Employment is up. As a matter of fact, last month almost 104 million Americans were employed. That is a record number, and since the 1982 recession, over 4 million Americans have been put to work. And just as important, Americans are taking home more buying power for the first time in years. After floundering since 1979, inflation adjusted, after-tax per capita disposable income rose 2.3 percent in 1983.

But, if the recovery is to continue, reasonable rates and an improved trade balance are essential. Continued massive budget deficits will make both impossible. Accordingly, I am introducing legislation to put more teeth into the budget process and commit the Federal Government to making measured progress in reducing deficits.

The problem with the current budget process is that nothing mandates that the deficit be reduced, nor that Congress live within any budget it establishes. Budget waivers seem to be a dime a dozen, and we failed even to come up with a reconciliating bill for this fiscal year. While the adoption in 1974 of the current budget process was a valiant attempt by Congress it impose some measure of self-discipline, it simply did not go far enough.

The bill which I am introducing would modify the budget process along the following lines:

Congress would be committed to adopting a budget which will reduce the fiscal year 1985 budget deficit about $29 billion below the fiscal year 1983 level, and continue further reductions each year until 1994 when deficits would be eliminated. During the first 2 years at least two-thirds of the reduction in the deficit—relative to baseline levels—must be in the form of spending reductions. Thereafter, spending reductions would be at least equal to revenue increases.

If Congress fails to meet the deficit target, the President would propose rescissions of budget authority sufficient to comply with the target but could propose reducing no area more than 10 percent, with any additional proposed reductions coming across-the-board. Congress, through a fast-track reconciliation process, could modify the President's proposed rescissions in any way it chooses.

But, if necessary changes are not promptly enacted, the President would be authorized to implement his original proposals with respect to areas of discretionary spending, and would be required to institute additional across-the-board reductions in all areas of spending—except interest on the debt, if necessary to meet the year's deficit reduction target.

The principles behind this legislation are simple. Congress should be willing to commit itself to making measured progress in reducing deficits and be willing to live within the budget it adopts. Congress should rely primarily on spending reductions in the short term and should balance any increases in taxes with additional spending cuts in the long run. If Congress shirks its responsibilities, then and only then, the President would have carefully limited discretion to decide where to make spending reductions. Unless it proves necessary to reduce every area of Government spending, no program could be reduced more than 10 percent by the President without congressional approval.

This legislation is not intended to be a cure-all for our current budget crisis. I personally remain committed to a constitutional amendment which would mandate a balanced budget as a permanent solution to the problem. In addition, it is encouraging to have on the table for consideration the so-called Republican deficit downpayment package. This is the sort of serious effort at a reasonable compromise which the current situation demands.

In the meantime, adopting legislation such as that which I am now introducing is necessary to keep deficits from getting further out of hand. If I had my way, we would reduce deficits much quicker than the schedule of targets contained in this bill. However, this is an honest attempt at a compromise which takes the admittedly painful but necessary first step in dealing with the defict problem.

I want to assure my colleagues that the modifications to the budget process which this bill contains leave to Congress the initiative in budgetary matters. If Congress takes the bull by the horns and does its job in the first instance, by adopting a budget which meets the deficit target and then sticking to it, the President would not be involved any more than the is today. If Congress fails to meet the target, the President can say how he would do the job, but Congress again would get a chance to modify his proposals before they take effect. In addition, the President would have no discretion to alter benefit levels or eligibility standards for entitlement programs unless Congress agrees by enacting those changes into law. Rather, the entitlements are subject to an across-the-board reduction only as a last resort and only when every other area of Government spending is reduced by an identical proportion; that is, the proportion needed to meet the deficit target.

Obviously, there are some programs that no one wants to see cut. On the other hand, there are others that could readily be scaled back or even eliminated with little real harm to anyone. While this legislation does not specify where reductions will be made, it does commit us to a solution to the problem one way or another. Adopting this legislation would mean Congress either could act in the best interest of all Americans and make the tough decisions that its Members are elected to make, or it could let the problem be dealt with by the President by default. I would hope that through this sort of plan we, as a Congress, would be prodded into dealing with the budget crisis in a forthright manner and according to our own priorities. We were elected to do a job; we had better start doing it.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"(1) the amount by which such law or laws would cause the total amount of revenues of the Federal Government for such fiscal year to exceed the amount of current law revenues set forth in the concurrent resolution on the budget adopted for such fiscal year under section 301 if economic conditions during such fiscal year were the same as the economic conditions assumed for such fiscal year in such concurrent resolution;

"SPECIAL MESSAGE PROPOSING RESCISSIONS TO REDUCE DEFICIT

"SEC. 1023. (a) Not later than 30 days after receiving any report under section 1022 that specifies an amount pursuant to paragraph (4) of subsection (a) of such section, the President shall transmit to the Congress a special message that proposes rescissions of budget authority for the fiscal year to which such report relates in an amount that will reduce the total budget outlays of the Federal Government for such fiscal year by an amount equal to the amount specified under such paragraph (as determined on the basis of estimates made by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office).

"(b)(1)(A) A special message transmitted under subsection (a) pursuant to a report transmitted under section 1022 for a fiscal year may propose rescissions of budget authority for such fiscal year with respect to any program, project, activity, or account of the Federal Government with respect to which the President determines that it is desirable to reduce outlays (except the budget authority provided by section 1305(2) of title 31, United States Code, for payment of interest on the public debt).

"(B) No rescission proposed in such special message pursuant to this paragraph may reduce the total amount of outlays for any program, project, activity, or account of the Federal Government for the fiscal year to which special message relates by an amount in excess of 10 percent of the total amount of outlays that would be made for such program, project, or activity for such fiscal year but for this paragraph (as determined on the basis of estimates made by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office).

"(C) If pursuant to this paragraph the President proposes to rescind for a fiscal year budget authority with respect to spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C), the special message proposing such rescission shall describe the changes that will be made in the program or programs to which such spending authority relates for such fiscal year if the Congress enacts a bill rescinding such budget authority.

"(2)(A) If the total amount of the rescissions proposed in such special message pursuant to paragraph (1) are insufficient to reduce the total outlays of the Federal Government for such fiscal year by an amount equal to the amount specified pursuant to section 1022(a)(4) in the report to which such special message relates, such special message shall propose additional rescissions of budget authority for such fiscal year with respect to each program, project, activity, and account of the Federal Government (including programs, projects, activities, and accounts with respect to which budget authority is proposed to be rescinded under paragraph (1)).

"(B) A rescission proposed pursuant to this paragraph with respect to any program, project, activity, or account shall reduce the total amount of outlays for such program, project, activity, or account by an amount equal to the product of—

"(i) the amount of outlays that would be made for the program, project, activity, or account for the fiscal year to which the special message proposing such rescission relates but for this subparagraph (as determined on the basis of estimates made by the Director of the Congressional Budget Office), and

"(ii) the percentage that will, if multiplied by the total amount of outlays that would be made for every program, project, activity, or account of the Federal Government for such fiscal year but for this paragraph, produce an amount that is equal to the remainder obtained by subtracting—

"(I) the total amount by which rescissions proposed in such special message under paragraph (1) would reduce the total amount of outlays of the Federal Government for such fiscal year, from

"(II) the amount specified pursuant to section 1022(a)(4) in such special message.

"(C)(i) A special message transmitted under subsection (a) shall describe the changes that will be made in any program for which spending authority described in section 401(C)(2)(C) has been enacted if the President is required under section 1024 to withhold from obligation and expenditure budget authority proposed to be rescinded with respect to such spending authority pursuant to this paragraph.

"(ii) Changes proposed in a program pursuant to clause (i) may include (I) a prorata reduction in the payments that would otherwise be required by law to be made under such program, and (II) changes promoting the efficient administration of such program, but may not include any change in the requirements established by law with respect to eligibility for, or entitlement to, payments under such program.

By Mr. HUMPHREY (for himself and Mr. BURDICK):

S. 2517. A bill to amend the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

DISASTER RELIEF ACT OF 1984

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am introducing the "Disaster Relief Act Amendments of 1984," and I ask for its appropriate referral.

The bill would amend the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, and I am glad to be joined in this endeavor by the senior Senator from North Dakota (QUENTIN BURDICK), who for many years has been a leader in disaster relief legislation. Senator BURDICK served as chairman of the Subcommittee on Disaster Relief when the 1974 act was written by the Senate Committee on Public Works.

The Disaster Relief Act of 1974 provides the basic Federal authorities for the Federal Emergency Management Agency to respond to requests for assistance by Governors of the States in which major disasters have occurred. Under the act, Presidents have declared more than 350 major disasters and emergencies. The act is central to relief efforts of all levels of government to save lives, protect public health, safety, and property, and to assist in recovery efforts in the wake of disasters.

The legislation I am introducing, if enacted, would provide the first comprehensive amendments to that act. It represents the culmination of work over the past year of the Subcommittee on Regional and Community Development of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, which I have the privilege to chair. Last July 21, the subcommittee commenced hearings by receiving testimony from the Federal Emergency Management Agency on S. 1525, which had been proposed by the administration. In September, additional hearings were held to receive oral testimony from respresentatives of State and local governments and voluntary disaster relief organizations. Represented at these hearings were the National Governors Association, the National Emergency Management Association, the Association of State Flood Plain Managers, the National Association of Counties, and the American Red Cross. Additional organizations were represented by written testimony.

One of the major concerns expressed to the subcommittee was the issue of which costs are eligible for reimbursement by the Federal Government. Over the years, Federal criteria have been written, amended, and expanded to the point where they are a hodgepodge of rules and regulations. Cost eligibility criteria are sometimes contradictory, complex, and hard to discern. For example, the committee has found that while single jacketed firehoses are not eligible for reimbursement for cleanup, a double jacketed hose meets the criteria set forth in the FEMA firehose policy. In one instance brooms were ruled eligible but shovels were ineligible. In yet another, Federal reimbursement was available for the removal of debris from a golf course but the removal of debris from grass in a cemetery was not eligible.

Two years ago, the committee reported that it was "* * * greatly concerned that current regulations and criteria defining what are and what are not 'eligible costs' are themselves confused, inconsistent and some times capricious. Some decisions appear to be ad hoc." The current rules add uncertainty and administrative burdens to State and local governments, to say nothing of the higher costs they must bear in providing disaster assistance. The committee encouraged FEMA—with the assistance of State and local officials—to throughly review the regulations and to render them more rational. I am glad that FEMA has attempted to do so. New proposed rulemaking was published in the Federal Register on February 3, 1984. I hope that State and local officials will review the proposed rules very carefully and provide constructive comments.

Under the new rulemaking, I am informed that FEMA has expanded the list of disaster-assistance-related expenses eligible for Federal reimbursement to include administrative costs, public employee salaries and fringe benefits, vehicle and equipment operating costs, and other previously excluded items. My staff estimates, using sample data supplied by FEMA, that the new regulations could reduce a State or local applicant's cost burden for small projects by 15.5 percent.

Mr. President, this issue of reimbursable costs is associated with the issue of cost sharing. Before 1980, the Federal Government assumed 100 percent of the cost of debris removal and replacement of public facilities. Clearly, under these circumstances there had to be strict regulations and policy guidance limiting the types and amount of federally reimbursible expenses. There was little incentive on the part of some non-Federal jurisdictions to be prudent in their demands, given the reimbursement policy then in effect.

Several years ago FEMA administratively, began to impose a 75-percent Federal, 25-percent State and local cost-sharing arrangement as a means to control costs for debris removal and public facilities replacement. The agency was able to do so under an interpretation of the Disaster Act of 1974 which would permit less than 100-percent reimbursement for these two categories of disaster assistance. However, FEMA has retained the stringent cost eligibility criteria adopted to conform with the earlier 100-percent reimbursement policy.

Witnesses at our hearings have expressed a great deal of concern about having to bear the double burden of cost-sharing and current eligibility criteria, especially when the latter exclude many legitimate disaster-assistance expenses. A major feature of this bill is to give statutory authority to the 75-25 cost-sharing arrangement. This step would lead to increased predictability for State and local jurisdictions of what their fair share of disaster assistance is going to be. The supplemental nature of Federal disaster assistance would likewise be assured. At the same time, it would be grossly unfair to impose cost sharing by statute without carefully considering the range of disaster-related expenses incurred by State and local authorities. Cost sharing enacted into law and revised cost-eligibility criteria must work hand in glove. We cannot have one without the other. FEMA proposed cost-eligibility rules should not be made permanent until the disaster act contains cost sharing.

Another related provision of the bill I am introducing today would permit cancellation of a loan or advance made to meet the non-Federal cost-share requirements if, after 3 fiscal years, an applicant demonstrates substantial and continuing inability to repay all or part of the commitment. In our hearings all the witnesses representing non-Federal governmental jurisdictions testified that cost sharing could devastate the budgets of local governments stricken by concurrent, multiple major disasters or by a single catastrophic major disaster. Loan cancellation under the circumstances is a justifiable remedy for such a severe burden.

Mr. President, the bill would also expand the "small project" block grant provision of current law. At present, FEMA may award a block grant, in lieu of categorical assistance, when the estimated cost of all projects belonging to a particular applicant does not exceed $25,000. The bill would change this provision to allow a grant for each individual small project. Based upon the most recent information, FEMA anticipates that approximately 90 percent of all projects processed, representing less than 10 percent of all funds expended, would be included under the new small project mechanism as a result of the change. This change would greatly reduce administrative costs and delays to State local governments and to FEMA as well. I hope that local governments do not overlook this significant change to current law.

The bill would also give greater flexibility to State and local governments to choose the type of facilities that would be replaced following a disaster. Under current law, there is a heavy penalty for a State or local government that elects to replace a destroyed public facility by constructing a new one which serves a different purpose. For example, consider a case in which five public facilities are destroyed in a county and county officials determine that one is no longer needed. In order to have the flexibility to construct a new facility to serve a different purpose instead of replacing the destroyed facility, the county must accept reimbursement based on 90 percent of the estimated cost of replacing all five facilities instead of 100 percent. To this estimated cost FEMA then administratively applied the 75-percent Federal cost share, which reduces reimbursement to the county to 67 percent for all five facilities, not just the one for which flexibility is needed. This provision of current law has been little used, in part because the penalty of such flexibility is substantial. The bill would change this provision to permit the county to take a penalty on a project-by-project basis. That is, the county would no longer be required to accept a penalty on all five projects in order to have the flexibility to construct one facility which is different from the one destroyed. Given demographic and other rapid social and economic changes in our country, I believe it is important to allow governmental jurisdictions to build to meet their current and projected needs rather than encouraging local governments to replace outdated facilities. Scarce capital expenditures should be directed into their highest and best use in a dynamic society.

Mr. President, the bill would also establish a program of hazard mitigation. Federal agencies, acting with State and local governments, would initiate measures to minimize the potential for recurrence of damages resulting from disasters. The immediate postdisaster situation often presents many opportunities to alleviate future risks. Under the provisions of the bill, FEMA could contribute 50 percent of the cost of mitigation measures, the balance to be contributed by the appropriate State of local jurisdiction. FEMA could expend up to 2.5 percent of total expenditures for permanent restorative public assistance for hazard mitigation. Given the currently critical budgetary problems of our national Government, this amount is admittedly modest in terms of the substantial need. On the other hand, such a hazard mitigation program would provide potential long-term savings to the Federal, State, and local governments far greater than the modest cost figures would indicate.

In order to assist States in updating and improving their disaster and emergency plans, the bill also would increase the Federal matching grant authority for preparedness planning from $25,000 to $50,000 per year. This increased Federal funding should facilitate better planning and preparedness. Better preparedness plans when carried out effectively can often alleviate hardships and reduce damages in disasters.

On another issue, current law permits Federal reimbursement to States for their costs associated with administration of the individual and family grant program. FEMA may reimburse up to 3 percent of the total Federal grant for administrative expenses associated with the program. The bill would also permit FEMA to reimburse 50 percent of the costs in excess of the 3 percent of total grant expenditures now eligible.

Mr. President, I believe that the bill and proposed rulemaking would provide State and local governments with significant savings and improvements over existing policies. Presently, they are required to contribute 25 percent of the cost of replacing public facilities and the list of items ineligible for Federal reimbursement adds to their costs. Further, there is no provision for forgiveness of local cost sharing. The new hazard mitigation provisions of the bill could alleviate damages in disasters. The expanded small project grants provision in lieu of categorical assistance would reduce redtape and administrative costs. The expanded flexible funding provision would give local governments more discretion in choosing which facilities should be replaced. The doubling of the Federal matching grant for preparedness and the increase in reimbursement of administrative costs of the individual and family grant program would reduce costs to State and local governments and could enhance governmental responses to disasters. The requirement for insurance where available at reasonable rates and the provision to enable the Federal Government to recover funds expanded in a disaster when private entities are found negligent would further enhance the disaster relief program.

Mr. President, in conclusion I trust all those involved in the disaster relief effort will evaluate the bill and the proposed rulemaking in conjunction and in view of the existing program. I believe that taken together, the bill and the new cost eligibility rules represent significant improvements in the disaster relief program for all concerned.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the proposed eligibility regulations and the bill be printed in the RECORD.

I will be working closely with Senator BURDICK and other committee members to move this bill through the committee and full Senate as expeditiously as possible. Improvements in the disaster relief program are long overdue, and I am hopeful that we can enact this legislation before the year is out.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Such request shall be based upon the Governor's finding that the situation is of such severity and magnitude that effective response is beyond the capabilities of the State and the affected local governments and that Federal assistance is necessary. The Governor's request will furnish information describing State and local efforts and resources which have been or will be used to alleviate the emergency, and will define the type and extent of Federal aid required. As a part of this request, and as a prerequisite to emergency assistance under the Act, the Governor shall take appropriate action under State law and direct execution of the State's emergency plan. Based upon such Governor's request, the President may declare that an emergency exists.

"(b) The President may exercise any authority vested in him by section 502 and section 503 of this Act with respect to an emergency when he determines that an emergency exists for which the primary responsibility for response rests with the United States because the emergency involves a subject area for which, under the Constitution or laws of the United States, the United States exercises exclusive or preeminent responsibility and authority. The President may determine that such an emergency exists only after consultation with the Governor of the affected State, if practicable. The President's determination, however, may be made without regard to the provisions of section 501(a) of this Act.

"FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 502. In any emergency, the President may—

"(a) direct any Federal agency with or without reimbursement to utilize its authorities and the resources granted to it under other Acts, including but not limited to personnel, equipment, supplies, facilities, and managerial, technical and advisory services in support of State and local emergency assistance efforts to save lives and to protect property, public health and safety or to lessen or avert the threat of a catastrophe;

"(b) coordinate all Federal agencies and voluntary relief or disaster assistance organizations providing emergency assistance, and coordinate emergency assistance with State and local officials; and

"(c) provide technical and advisory assistance to affected State and local governments in the performance of essential community services, warning of risks of hazards, public information and assistance in health and safety measures, management and control, and reduction of immediate threats to public health and safety.

"EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 503. (a) In an emergency, when the Federal assistance provided pursuant to section 502 of this title is inadequate, the President may provide assistance to save lives and protect property, public health and safety, or to lessen or avert the threat of a catastrophe. When debris removal assistance is appropriate under this section, it shall be provided in accordance with the terms and conditions of section 406 of this Act.

"(b) In any emergency and except as provided by subsection (c) of this section, the costs of providing emergency assistance under this section shall not exceed $5,000,000 of funds appropriated to carry out this Act.

"(c) The limitation of subsection (b) of this section may be exceeded when the President determines that continued emergency assistance is immediately required; that there is a continuing and immediate risk to lives, property, public health or safety; and that necessary assistance will not otherwise be provided on a timely basis. In the event that the limitation of subsection (b) is exceeded, the President shall report to Congress on the nature and extent of the emergency assistance requirements and propose additional legislation if necessary.".

SEC. 6. Title II of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5131-5132), is amended by—

(1) striking the words "(including the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency)" in section 201(a);

(2) adding the words "including evaluations of natural hazards and development of the programs and actions required to mitigate such hazards," between the words "plans" and "except" in section 201(d); and

(3) striking "$25,000" in section 201(d) and inserting in lieu thereof "$50,000".

SEC. 7. Title III of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5141-5158), is amended by—

SEC. 9. Section 314 of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5154), is amended by redesignating subsections (a), (b), and (c) as (b), (c), and (d), respectively, and by adding at the beginning thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(a) As a condition of assistance, any public facility and private nonprofit facility which is:

"(1) located in a special flood hazard area as identified by the Director pursuant to the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968, as amended (42 U.S.C. 4001 et seq.);

"(2) damaged or destroyed by flooding; and

"(3) otherwise eligible for assistance under section 405 of this Act, must be covered, on the date of the flood damage, by reasonable and adequate flood insurance. Assistance under section 405 for any such facility not so covered shall be reduced by the maximum amount of benefits which could have been received had reasonable and adequate flood insurance been in force: Provided, however, That this reduction of assistance shall not apply to uninsured facilities where such communities have been identified for less than one year as having special flood hazard areas. The limitations of assistance required by this subsection shall not apply until final regulations are promulgated by the President. The President shall establish such procedures as are deemed necessary to insure uniformity in preventing such duplication of benefits. Receipt of partial benefits for a loss or need resulting from a major disaster or emergency does not preclude provision of additional Federal assistance for any part of such loss or need for which benefits have not been provided.

"(b) A person, business concern, or other entity receiving Federal assistance for needs or losses resulting from a major disaster or emergency shall be liable to the United States to the extent that such Federal assistance has duplicated benefits available to the person, business concern, or other entity for the same purpose from insurance or any other Federal or non-Federal sources. The agency or other organization which provided the duplicative assistance shall collect such duplicative assistance from the recipient in accordance with the Claims Collection Act of 1966, as amended, when in the best interest of the Government. The repayment shall not exceed the amount of Federal assistance received.

"(c) Federal disaster assistance and comparable disaster assistance provided by States, local governments, and disaster assistance organizations to individuals and families shall not be considered as income or a resource when determining eligibility or benefit levels for federally funded income assistance or resource tested benefit program.".

SEC. 11. (a) Title III of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5141-5158), is amended by adding at the end thereof four new sections as follows:

No action taken or assistance provided pursuant to section 402, 403, 406, 502, or 503 of this Act, or any assistance provided pursuant to section 405 of this Act that has the effect of restoring facilities substantially as they existed prior to the disaster, shall be deemed a major Federal action significantly affecting the quality of the human environment within the meaning of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 (83 Stat. 852). Nothing in this section shall alter or affect the applicability of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 (83 Stat. 852) to other Federal actions taken under this Act or under any other provisions of law.

"RECOVERY OF FUNDS

"SEC. 316. The Attorney General of the United States is authorized to institute actions in the United States District Court for the district in which an emergency or major disaster occurred, or in such district as otherwise provided by law, against any party whose acts or omissions may in any way have caused or contributed to the damage or hardship for which Federal assistance is provided pursuant to this Act. Upon the showing that an emergency or major disaster or the associated damage or hardship was caused in whole or in part by an act or omission of such party, then such party shall be liable to the United States for the full amount of Federal expenditures made to alleviate the suffering or damage attributable to such act or omission. The authority of this section shall also apply to the recovery of Federal funds expended under the authority of section 419 of this Act for fire suppression.

"CRIMINAL AND CIVIL PENALTIES

"SEC. 318. (a) Any person, organization, or other entity who knowingly makes a false statement or representation of a material fact, or who knowingly fails to disclose a material fact, in any application or other document in connection with a request for assistance under this Act, or who knowingly falsifies or withholds, conceals, or destroys any documents, books, records, reports, or statements upon which such request for assistance is based, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, for each violation.

"(b) Any person, organization, or other entity who knowingly makes a false statement or representation of a material fact, or who knowingly fails to disclose a material fact, in any bill, invoice, claim, or other document requesting reimbursement for work or services performed in connection with assistance provided under this Act, or who knowingly falsifies or withholds, conceals, or destroys any documents, books, records, reports, or statements upon which such request for reimbursement is based, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, for each violation.

"(e) The President, or the duly authorized representative of the President, shall expeditiously refer to the Attorney General of the United States for appropriate action such evidence developed in the performance of functions under this Act as may be found to warrant consideration for criminal prosecution under the provisions of this Act or other Federal law.".

(b) Title III of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended, is amended by deleting subsections (a) and (c) of section 317 (42 U.S.C. 5157), and by renumbering "(b)" from the remaining subsection of section 317 as subsection "(f)" of amended section 318.

(c) Title IV of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended, is amended by deleting section 405 (42 U.S.C. 5175) and by renumbering subsequent sections appropriately.

SEC. 12. Title IV of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5171-5189), is amended by adding three new sections as follows and by renumbering subsequent sections appropriately:

"PROCEDURES

"SEC. 401. (a) All requests for a declaration by the President that a major disaster exists shall be made by the Governor of the affected State. Such Governor's request shall be based upon a finding that the disaster is of such severity and magnitude that effective response is beyond the capabilities of the State and the affected local governments and that Federal assistance is necessary. As a part of this request, and as a prerequisite to major disaster assistance under the Act, the Governor shall take appropriate action under State law and direct execution of the State's emergency plan. He shall furnish information on the extent and nature of State resources which have been or will be used to alleviate the conditions of the disaster, and shall certify that for the current disaster, State and local government obligations and expenditures (of which State commitments must be a significant proportion) will constitute the expenditure of a reasonable amount of the funds of such State and local governments for alleviating the damage, loss, hardship, or suffering resulting from such disaster, including, but not limited to, the cost-sharing provisions pursuant to sections 405, 406, 407, and 410 of this Act. Based upon such Governor's request, the President may declare that a major disaster exists.

"(b) In any case where an eligible applicant (or the State) is unable to assume its financial responsibility under the cost-sharing provisions of sections 405, 406, and 407 of this Act, the President is authorized to lend or advance to the State such 25 per centum share. For the purposes of section 405, such loan or advance shall be authorized only after the occurrence of concurrent, multiple major disasters in a given jurisdiction, or the extraordinary costs of a particular major disaster, and when the damages caused by such major disasters are so overwhelming and severe that it is not possible for the applicant or the State to assume their financial responsibility under this Act immediately. Except as provided by subsection (c) of this section any such loan or advance is to be repaid to the United States; there shall be no deferral of the repayment of loans or advances authorized by this subsection or of accrued interest. Such obligations shall bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States with remaining periods to maturity comparable to the reimbursement period of the loan or advance.

"(c) The President may cancel all or any part of such loan or advance made regarding section 405 or section 406 for concurrent, multiple major disasters or a single catastrophic major disaster if a determination is made that following the three full fiscal years after the loan or advance is made, the applicant demonstrates substantial and continuing inability to repay all or part of the loan or advance.

"(d) The President shall issue regulations describing the terms and conditions under which any loans or advances authorized by this section may be made or cancelled.

"FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

SEC. 402. In any major disaster, the President may—

"(a) direct any Federal agency with or without reimbursement to utilize its authorities and the resources granted to it under other Acts including, but not limited to, personnel, equipment, supplies, facilities, and managerial, technical, and advisory services in support of State and local assistance efforts;

"(b) coordinate all Federal agencies and voluntary relief or disaster assistance organizations providing disaster assistance, and coordinate disaster assistance with State and local officials; and

"(c) provide technical and advisory assistance to affected State and local governments in the performance of essential community services, warning of risks and hazards, public information and assistance in health and safety measures, management and control, and reduction of immediate threats to public health and safety.

"COOPERATION OF FEDERAL AGENCIES IN RENDERING DISASTER ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 403. (a) In any major disaster, Federal agencies are hereby authorized, on the direction of the President, to provide assistance by—

"(1) utilizing or lending, with or without compensation therefor, to States and local governments, their equipment, supplies, facilities, personnel, and other resources, other than the extension of credit under the authority of any Act;

"(2) distributing or rendering, through the American National Red Cross, the Salvation Army, the Mennonite Disaster Service, and other relief and disaster assistance organizations, or otherwise, medicine, food, and other consumable supplies, other services to disaster victims, or emergency assistance;

"(3) donating or lending equipment and supplies, including that determined in accordance with applicable law to be surplus to the needs and responsibilities of the Federal Government, to State and local governments for use or distribution by them for the purposes of this Act; and

"(4) performing on public or private lands or waters any emergency work or services essential to save lives and to protect and preserve property, public health and safety, including, but not limited to: Search and rescue, emergency medical care, emergency mass care, emergency shelter, and provisions of food, water, medicine, and other essential needs, including movement of supplies or persons; construction of temporary bridges necessary to the performance of emergency tasks and essential community services; provision of temporary facilities for schools and other essential community services; warning of further risks and hazards; public information and assistance on health and safety measures; technical advice to State and local governments on disaster management and control; reduction of immediate threats to life, property, and public health and safety; and making contributions to State or local governments for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this paragraph. Such contributions for emergency work under this section and section 402 of this Act shall not exceed 100 per centum of the net eligible cost, or for small projects 100 per centum of the Federal estimate of the net eligible cost, of such emergency work or services performed by State and local governments: Provided, That where debris removal assistance is appropriate under this section or section 402 of this Act it shall be provided in accordance with the terms and conditions of section 406 of this Act."

SEC. 13. (a) Section 402 of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5172), is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The President is authorized to make contributions to State or local governments, to help repair, restore, reconstruct, or replace public facilities belonging to such State or local government which were damaged or destroyed by a major disaster. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, such contributions shall be limited to 75 per centum of the net eligible cost, or for small projects 75 per centum of the Federal estimate of the net eligible cost, of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing any such facility estimated on the basis of the design of such facility as it existed immediately prior to such major disaster and in conformity with current applicable codes, specifications, and standards. For the purposes of this section, 'public facility' includes any publicly owned flood control, navigation, irrigation, reclamation, public power, sewage treatment and collection, water supply and distribution, watershed development, or airport facility, any non-Federal-aid street, road, or highway, any other public building, structure, or system including those used for educational or recreational purposes, and any park.

"(b) The President is authorized to make contributions to help repair, restore, reconstruct, or replace eligible private nonprofit facilities which were damaged or destroyed by a major disaster. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, such contributions shall be limited to 75 per centum of the net eligible cost, or for small projects 75 per centum of the Federal estimate of the net eligible cost, of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing any such facility estimated on the basis of the design of such facility as it existed immediately prior to such major disaster and in conformity with current applicable codes, specifications, and standards. For the purposes of this section, 'eligible private nonprofit facility' means private nonprofit educational, utility, emergency, medical, and custodial care facilities, including those for the aged and disabled, and such private nonprofit facilities on Indian reservations, which were damaged or destroyed by a major disaster.

"(c) No authority under this section shall be exercised unless the affected State, local government, or eligible private nonprofit organization first agrees that such facility shall be repaired, restored, reconstructed, or replaced in compliance with flood plain management and hazard mitigation criteria required by the President, with the provisions of the Coastal Barrier Resources Act and other applicable Federal statutes, and in conformity with other applicable codes, specifications, and standards, except as otherwise provided in section 315 of this Act.

"(d) For those facilities eligible under this section which were in the process of construction when damaged or destroyed by a major disaster, the contribution shall be based on 75 per centum of the net eligible costs of restoring such facilities substantially to their predisaster condition: Provided, That the term 'net eligible costs' shall not include costs which, under a contract, are the responsibility of a contractor.

"(e) In those cases, except for small projects, where a State or local government determines that public welfare would not be best served by repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing particular public facilities owned or controlled by that State or that local government which have been damaged or destroyed in a major disaster, it may elect to receive, in lieu of the contribution described in subsection (a) of this section, a contribution based on 50 per centum of the Federal estimate of the net eligible cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing such damaged facilities owned by it within its jurisdiction. The cost of repairing, restoring, reconstructing, or replacing damaged or destroyed public facilities shall be estimated on the basis of the design of each such facility as it existed immediately prior to such disaster and in conformity with current applicable codes, specifications, and standards. Funds contributed under this subsection may be expended either to repair or restore certain selected damaged public facilities or to construct new public facilities which the State or local government determines to be necessary to meet its needs for governmental services and functions in the disaster-affected area.".

(b) The Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended, is amended by deleting section 419 (42 U.S.C. 5189) and by striking "or 419" each place that this phrase appears in section 314 (42 U.S.C. 5154).

(c) Section 403 of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5173), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, whether carried out directly through Federal departments, agencies, or instrumentalities or through grants to State or local governments, Federal assistance provided under authority of this section shall not exceed 75 per centum of the net eligible costs, or for small projects 75 per centum of the Federal estimate of the net eligible costs, of debris removal.".

SEC. 14. Section 404(a) of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 is amended to read as follows:

"(a) The President is authorized to provide, either by purchase or lease, temporary housing including, but not limited to, unoccupied habitable dwellings, suitable rental housing, mobile homes, or other readily fabricated dwellings for those who, as a result of a major disaster, require temporary housing. Whenever he determines it to be in the public interest, the President is authorized to provide temporary housing assistance by using Federal departments, agencies, or instrumentalities. In addition, the President is authorized to provide temporary housing assistance by contributing not to exceed 100 per centum (or 75 per centum for group site development pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection) of the costs of temporary housing assistance to a State or local government which provides such assistance to those who require it as a result of a major disaster. Federal financial and operational responsibilities for temporary housing assistance shall not exceed eighteen months from the date of the major disaster declaration by the President, unless he determines that due to extraordinary circumstances it would be in the public interest to extend the eighteen month period.

"(1) Temporary housing assistance pursuant to this subsection shall be provided only when adequate alternative housing is unavailable, unless there is compelling need to do so because of extreme hardship. The assistance to be provided shall be determined by the President taking into account the fair market value of the accommodations being supplied and the post-disaster financial ability of the occupant.

"(2) Any mobile home or other readily fabricated dwelling supplied pursuant to this subsection shall be placed on a site complete with utilities provided either by the State or local government, or by the owner or occupant of the site who was displaced by the major disaster. When the President determines such action to be in the public interest, he may authorize installation of essential utilities at Federal expense and he may elect to provide other more economical or accessible sites. However, in the event the President authorizes the development of a group site, that is, a site for two or more households, the Federal share shall be limited to 75 per centum of the development costs, and the remainder shall be met by funds provided by the State or local government."

SEC. 15. Section 406 of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5176), is amended by adding "(a)" after "406." and by adding a new subsection "(b)" as follows:

"(b) The President is authorized to contribute up to 50 per centum of the cost of implementing hazard mitigation projects which he has determined would be cost effective and would substantially reduce the risk of future damage, hardship, loss or suffering in the area affected by a major disaster. Such projects shall be identified following the evaluation of natural hazards provided for in subsection (a) of this section and shall be subject to approval by the President. The total of the contributions made under this subsection shall not exceed 2.5 per centum of the Federal estimate of grants made under the authority of section 405 of this Act for each major disaster.".

SEC. 16. Section 407(a) of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5177), is amended to read as follows: "The President is authorized to provide such disaster unemployment assistance as he deems appropriate to individuals who are unemployed as a result of a major disaster. Disaster unemployment assistance authorized by this section shall be available to an eligible individual for a period not to exceed fifty-two weeks after the week in which an eligible individual became unemployed as a result of a major disaster, and such period shall be regarded as the disaster assistance period for that individual for the purposes of this section. Disaster unemployment assistance shall not be payable with respect to any week for which an individual is entitled to unemployment compensation (as defined in section 85(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended) or waiting week credit. The maximum amount of disaster unemployment assistance payable to any individual with respect to a major disaster shall not exceed twenty-six times the maximum weekly amount for which the individual establishes eligibility minus the amount of any unemployment compensation paid to the individual during the fifty-two week benefit period established pursuant to this section. Such assistance for a week of unemployment shall not exceed the maximum weekly amount authorized under the unemployment compensation law of the State in which the disaster occurred, and the amount of assistance under this section for a week of unemployment shall be reduced by any amount of private income protection insurance compensation available to such individual for such week of unemployment. The payment of unemployment compensation to an individual with respect to any week subsequent to the exhaustion of eligibility of such individual for disaster unemployment assistance and within the fifty-two week benefit period established pursuant to this section shall not be regarded as duplication of benefits under section 312 of this Act. The President is directed to provide disaster unemployment assistance through agreements with States which, in his judgment, have an adequate system for administering such assistance through existing State agencies."

SEC. 17. (a) Section 408(b) of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, as amended (42 U.S.C. 5178), is amended by adding a period after the word "share" in the second sentence of that subsection and by deleting the following phrase from the second sentence of section 408(b): "and any such advance is to be repaid to the United States when such State is able to do so.".

Repayment of such advances and of interest which accrues on the advances may be deferred for no longer than two years from the date of the major disaster declaration.".

FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY

44 CFR Part 205

DISASTER ASSISTANCE; ELIGIBILITY OF COSTS OF PUBLIC ASSISTANCE TO STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

Agency: Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Action: Proposed rule.

Summary: This proposed rule makes changes to the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) disaster assistance regulations implementing the Disaster Relief Act of 1974, Pub. L. 93-288. Changes are made in the eligibility of costs of public assistance to State and local governments. This is being done in recognition of the commitment to the disaster effort now being made by applicants in the form of cost sharing of eligible costs.

Dates: Comments by: June 4, 1984.

Address: Send Comments to: Rules Docket Clerk, Office of General Counsel, Room 835, Federal Emergency Management Agency, 500 C Street SW, Washington, D.C. 20472.

For further information contact: Charles B. Stuart, Federal Emergency Management Agency, 500 C Street SW., Washington, D.C. 20472, telephone 202/287-0580.

Supplementary information: Federal disaster assistance under Pub. L. 93-288 is intended to supplement State and local capabilities and efforts to cope with a disaster, but not to supplant them. A Governor's request for a declaration of a major disaster or emergency must be supported by certification that State and local applicants have committed or will commit a reasonable amount of funds to cope with the disaster. Past commitments were accepted recognizing that some disaster related costs of the types not eligible under Pub. L. 93-288 were defrayed by grant recipients from their own funds. Other disaster related costs may be incurred by grant recipients directly or indirectly for which auditable records are not maintained and for which no Federal assistance could be claimed.

Currently the commitment by the State and local grantees is partially satisfied by a contribution of a percentage of the cost of eligible grant assistance. The amount of this percentage is determined on a case-by-case basis for each disaster. Taking into consideration this cost sharing as a portion of the State and local commitment, and the statutory requirement that the public assistance be supplementary, FEMA is considering changes to the eligibility of costs. Discussions were held with representatives of the National Emergency Management Association (NEMA) on this subject. Their recommendations have been taken into account in formulating the proposed changes.

S. 1525, a bill to amend the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 is currently pending in the Senate. S. 1525 is essentially the same as the bill (S. 2250) which passed the Senate during the 97th Congress. S. 1525 addresses the issue of State and local commitments and would establish a cost sharing formula as part of the law. The changes in cost eligibility in this proposed rule are consistent with FEMA's proposed changes to Pub. L. 93-288 and with the intent of the Senate expressed in the passage of S. 2250.

Passage of S. 1525 may require changes to disaster assistance regulations in areas other than cost eligibility, the following changes in the cost eligibility subsection of the regulation (44 CFR 205.76) are proposed:

(a)(1) Definitions of total eligible costs and net eligible costs are given to reflect sharing of costs by Federal and non-Federal interests. Selected other criteria are clarified.

(a)(7)(i) Administrative Expenses—A previous revision to these regulations (August 13, 1980) considered whether certain costs should be made eligible in accordance with OMB Circular 74-4 (Now A-87). At that time the decision on certain indirect costs was deferred until further consultation could be conducted with the Office of Management and Budget. This proposed change makes eligible an allowance for administrative expenses and provides a method for calculation of such an allowance. The percentage allowances for applicants' administrative costs were arrived at through FEMA's experience in dealing with disaster claims. While these costs have not been eligible in the past and therefore were not included in assistance claims, applicants have frequently advised us of the impact of these costs. In accordance with the supplementary nature of FEMA assistance under Pub. L. 93-288 the allowance will cover only the extraordinary expenses incurred as a direct result of a disaster. The percentage is an average of a sample of a number of different communities. It will be the same for all applicants. This practice has worked well for a number of years in the allowances for the use of applicant owned equipment to perform eligible disaster work.

(a)(7)(iii) The proposed change makes the cost of State audits required by FEMA an eligible cost.

(a)(7)(iv) The proposed change makes certain costs of State inspectors eligible.

(a)(19) National Guard—Most types of National Guard expenses would now be eligible, including security work.

(a)(22) Prison Labor—Certain costs of guards and food and lodging for prisoners and guards would be eligible.

(b)(2)(iv) Fringe Benefits—These costs have also been considered in accordance with the guidance of OMB Circular A-87. Certain fringe benefits paid by an employer for an applicant's employees would be eligible for reimbursement. The fringe benefits for which an allowance is made are those which represent extraordinary costs as a direct result of the disaster. Disaster recovery work generally results in the diversion of an applicant's employees from their regular duties. The increased hours of work will affect only certain types of fringe benefits such as the employer's Social Security contribution and similar payments. Other benefits, such as vacation or sick leave, are not affected by overtime work. The principal of paying only for certain costs is in accordance with the supplementary nature of Federal disaster assistance under Pub. L. 93-288. A fixed percentage allowance is proposed because the costs of the benefits included vary among the different state and local governments. In addition, in some states not all employees are covered by the particular benefits. A percentage of 10.5 percent was arrived at after consultation with other Federal agencies. It is made up of the following allowances: employee retirement (Social Security or other)—7 percent; unemployment insurance—1.5 percent; and worker's compensation—2 percent. For those grants where payment is based on the estimate of the cost of work, this percentage shall be used for fringe benefits. Grants in this category are flexible funding, grants-in-lieu, and small project grants (under $25,000). For other categorical grants, the applicant will have a choice of using this percentage or of submitting documentation in support of different rates for the three coverages. The use of a set percentage would expedite the processing of these grants. Estimating and accounting for these costs for each applicant could result in delays. This would be particularly significant for the 80 percent of applicants which receive small project grants under $25,000. This is because Pub. L. 93-288 provides simplified procedures to expedite payment to these applicants. It would be inconsistent to complicate the procedures unnecessarily.

Environmental Considerations—This amendment is administrative in nature and is categorically excluded from the requirements of 44 CFR Part 10 concerning preparation of environmental assessments.

Executive Order 12291, "Federal Regulations"—This rule is not a "major rule" within the context of Executive Order 12291. It will not have an annual effect on the economy of $100 million or more.

The rule will not have a significant economic impact on small entities, within the meaning of 5 U.S.C. 605 (the Regulatory Flexibility Act). Therefore, no regulatory analysis will be prepared.

This rule does not call for the collection of any information.

Authority: This rule is issued under authority of Section 601 of the Disaster Relief Act of 1974 (Pub. L. 93-288), as amended by Pub. L. 96-446.

PART 205—FEDERAL DISASTER ASSISTANCE

Accordingly, Subchapter D of Chapter 1, Title 44 is proposed to be amended as follows:

1. Section 205.76 is amended by revising paragraph (a)(1) to read as follows:

§ 205.76 Eligibility of costs.

(a) General. (1) This section provides policies and guidelines for determining eligibility of costs of work eligible under the Act that may be paid to any eligible applicant or other recipient of this grant assistance. As used in this section, eligible costs include total costs that are subject to costs sharing and are otherwise reimbursable under these regulations. The applicable cost sharing percentages must be used to determine net eligible costs which may be approved and reimbursed by FEMA. The subparagraphs which follow are generally applicable to eligibility of costs. Only reasonable costs of eligible work are reimbursable.

2. Section 205.76 is amended by revising paragraphs (a)(2) (i), (iv) and (vii) to read as follows:

(2) * * *

(i) Be necessary and reasonable for proper and efficient administration of the grant programs, be allocable thereto under these principles, and, except as specifically provided herein, not be a general expense required to carry out the overall responsibilities of State, local or Federally-recognized Indian tribal governments. Costs of projects must be directly attributable to the performance of eligible work. Indirect costs incurred as a result of the disaster are covered by the allowance for administrative expenses (see § 205.76(a)(7)).

* * * * *

(iv) Be consistent with policies, regulations, and procedures (of the applicant) that apply uniformly to both federally assisted and other activities of the unit of government of which the grantee is a part.

* * * * *

(vii) Be net of all applicable credits which offset or reduce eligible disaster costs. Examples are purchase discounts, insurance recoveries and salvage.

* * * * *

3. Section 205.76 is amended by revising paragraph (a)(4) to read as follows:

(a) * * *

(4) The amount of Federal reimbursement made to an applicant under categorical funding or under a small project grant is limited to the net eligible cost of performing work approved by FEMA. This limitation is not intended to restrict the type and cost of work which the applicant may choose to undertake. If the applicant performs work in excess of the approved amount, Federal assistance is limited to the net costs of eligible work approved by the Regional Director. Flexible funding under section 402(f) of the Act is limited to 90 percent of the net estimated costs of eligible permanent restorative work.

* * * * *

4. Section 205.76 is amended by revising paragraph (a)(7) to read as follows:

(a) * * *

(7) Administrative Expenses.

(i) An allowance to cover expenses attributable to requesting, obtaining, and administering FEMA grant assistance is eligible in accordance with the following:

(A) For those applicants whose total eligible costs are less than $100,000, such allowance shall be three percent of total eligible costs (estimated costs for recipients of small project grants).

(B) For those applicants whose total eligible costs exceed $100,000 but are less than $1,000,000, such allowance shall be $3,000 plus two percent of total eligible costs in excess of $100,000.

(C) For those applicants whose total eligible costs exceed $1,000,000 but are less than $5,000,000, such allowance shall be $21,000 plus one percent of total eligible costs in excess of $1,000,000.

(D) For those applicants whose total eligible costs exceed $5,000,000 such allowance shall be $61,000 plus one-half percent of total eligible costs in excess of $5,000,000.

(ii) Subject to the limitations stated in subsection (7)(i) above, the allowance for administrative expenses includes, but is not limited to, the following types of work:

(A) Preparation of project applications, reports, appeals, inspection reports, materials for audits, and claims for payment.

(B) Performance of owners' responsibilities.

(C) Operation of Emergency Operations Center.

(D) Salaries, wages, fees, and expenses of individuals or firms while engaged in the preparation and processing of damage assessments, damage survey reports, project applications, claims for payment and supporting documentation.

(E) Office supplies and equipment.

(F) Rent.

(G) Telephone and telegraph expenses.

(iii) Reasonable actual costs of State audits, when determined necessary by FEMA, are eligible to be included in total eligible costs. Costs of such audits shall not exceed one percent of audited eligible costs, unless written justification for higher costs is submitted to FEMA.

(iv) Reasonable actual costs, as determined by FEMA, of State inspectors engaged in preparation of Damage Survey Reports and Final Inspection Reports and related field inspections, are eligible. These costs are subject to the following limitation: Reimbursement may be made for travel, per diem, and overtime, but not regular time salaries.

* * * * *

5. Section 205.76 is amended by revising paragraphs (a) (19) and (20) to read as follows:

(a) * * *

(19) National Guard—Actual costs paid by the State for eligible work performed by the National Guard including salaries of Guardsmen directly engaged in eligible work or in direct supervision of such work are eligible. Eligible work includes public safety or security measures as well as other types of work eligible under these regulations.

(2) Cooperative agreements.

(i) Eligible: Costs for work performed under cooperative arrangements between State or local governments, but limited to those direct costs of the performing entity which the applicant is legally obligated to pay and which would be eligible if the applicant had performed the work.

(ii) Not eligible: Costs for work performed under an arrangement between a State or political subdivision of a State and a Federal agency, except when approved in advance by the Regional Director.

* * * * *

6. Section 205.76 is amended by revising paragraph (a)(22) to read as follows:

(a) * * *

(22) Prison labor.

(i) Eligible: Out-of-pocket costs of prison labor performing eligible disaster work, limited to the amount paid the prisoners in accordance with rates established prior to the disaster, and the cost of transportation. In addition the portion of the following costs which are in excess of regular budgeted amounts, are eligible for reimbursement:

(A) Cost of food and lodging for prisoners, and

(B) Salaries of guards.

This eligibility will apply only to the extent that total compensation for employees is eligible as defined by paragraph § 205.76(b) (i) and (ii).

(iv) Actual payment for fringe benefits for small project grants, grants-in-lieu, and flexible funding will be the percentage established in § 205.76(b)(2)(iii). Payment for fringe benefits for categorical grants may be such percentage or actual costs for such coverages at the applicant's choice. Documentation of actual costs of retirement benefits, unemployment insurance and worker's compensation must be provided with the applicant's final claim if that method of payment is chosen.

9. Section 205.76 is amended by revising paragraph (b)(3)(ii) to read as follows:

(3) * * *

(ii) For vehicles or equipment utilized by police, firemen, and other employees whose duties do not change because of the major disaster or emergency; and for permanently installed fixed equipment, such as pumping stations, only disaster-related actual costs in excess of average costs are eligible. Average costs shall be calculated by using a like duration of time, or the closest duration for which auditable records are available, for the previous three years. Years in which a Presidentially declared major disaster occurred during the period being examined shall not be included in the average.

10. Section 205.76 is amended by removing paragraph (b)(3)(iii).

12. Section 205.76 is amended by revising paragraph (e)(2) to read as follows:

* * * * *

(d) * * *

(2) Engineering and design. Reimbursement for eligible engineering, planning, design, supervision, or inspection services is based upon reasonable actual direct costs but shall not exceed the amount approved on the project application, or on a supplemental project application. Applicants may not contract for architect/engineers' services on the basis of a percentage of project construction cost, nor make compensation on such basis. The Regional Director may approve special services, such as engineering surveys, soil investigations, resident engineers, and additional construction inspection when justified.

Billing Code 67-18-01-M●

● Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, I am glad to join as a cosponsor of the Disaster Relief Act Amendments of 1984. I remind my colleagues that similar legislation passed the Senate unanimously in 1982 but was not acted upon by the House.

For several years, I have been concerned that the Disaster Relief Act of 1974—which I sponsored—has been expanded beyond the original intent of the Congress. The act was written to provide broad, comprehensive authority for Federal assistance following natural disasters such as floods, hurricanes, tornadoes, and volcanoes. For this purpose it has functioned very well over the years in hundreds of disasters throughout the Nation. However, in recent years, the Federal Emergency Management Agency has interpreted the act to provide Federal authority to intervene in any type of catastrophe, whether natural or man made.

I am glad that the bill clarifies the original intent of the Congress by reformulating the definitions of "major disaster" and "emergency." The new definition of "major disaster" limits its meaning to those catastrophic events which are explicitly listed in the act at the present time or any other natural catastrophe. Catastrophes arising from social unrest or economic upheaval cannot be considered a "major disaster" under this revised definition for the purposes of invoking a Presidential disaster declaration.

The term "emergency" is redefined to authorize the President to provide Federal assistance in any instance when he determines that such assistance is essential to save lives, to protect property, public health and safety, or to lessen or avert the threat of a catastrophe. In any emergency the President must first invoke other Federal authorities available to him to meet the crisis. The role of the Federal Emergency Management Agency would be limited to providing technical assistance and coordinating the efforts of other Federal agencies under authorities granted to them under other Federal acts. Only after a determination that assistance under other Federal authorities is inadequate to meet the crisis may FEMA directly intervene. Up to $5 million in Federal assistance may be provided for each emergency before the President is required to ask the Congress for additional funds.

Mr. President, a fundamental principle of the Disaster Relief Act is that Federal assistance supplement the efforts and resources of State and local governments. Before the President may make a major disaster declaration, the Governor of the affected State must declare that the disaster is beyond the capability of the State and local governments to respond without Federal assistance. He must also commit State and local resources to the disaster effort and certify that State and local expenditures "will constitute the expenditure of a reasonable amount of the funds of such State and local governments for alleviating the damage, loss, hardship, or suffering resulting from such disaster * * *."

For a number of years, the question of what constitutes a reasonable commitment was resolved on a case-by-case basis through negotiations with the affected non-Federal jurisdictions. State and local governments could not know in advance what their commitment would be in the event of a disaster. This budget uncertainty greatly hampered disaster assistance planning and could slow down response and recovery efforts. In 1980, in the previous administration, beginning with Mount St. Helens disaster, FEMA established a cost-sharing formula whereby State and local governments would be responsible for 25 percent of the costs of repairing or replacing public facilities and of debris removal.

The bill establishes this cost-sharing formula in the statue and should resolve the longstanding and difficult issue of what constitutes a reasonable State and local government commitment in most disasters. I support this provision of the bill and believe it is a needed clarification of the 1974 act. State and local governments will benefit by resolving this issue and establishing in statute the appropriate level of commitment of their resources in disasters to be regarded as the prerequisite for supplemental Federal assistance. It would facilitate budgetary planning by removing a major uncertainty. It would also eliminate redtape and administrative delays that in the past accompanies negotiations to settle the proper cost-sharing arrangements.

I hope that State and local governments will recognize that a non-Federal share of disaster assistance costs is fundamental to the Disaster Relief Act. It has always been required by negotiations following each disaster and by stringent Federal rules and regulations. The cost-sharing provisions of this bill do not establish a new principle. They merely resolve the previously controversial issue of the appropriate level of State and local commitment.

I hope the State and local governments will also not overlook the many changes in this bill which would be beneficial to them, especially the provision of a mechanism to forgive loans made to non-Federal jurisdictions under extraordinary circumstances. While the cost-sharing formula is firmly established under current practice, State and local governments do not now have the protection that would be provided by enactment of this loan forgiveness provision.

Mr. President, in conclusion I reiterate my support of the bill and commend it to my colleagues.●

By Mr. WARNER (for himself, Mr. TOWER, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. JEPSEN, Mr. TRIBLE, and Mr. THURMOND):

S. 2519. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to deductions for certain expenses incurred by a member of a uniformed service of the United States, or by a minister, who receives a housing or subsistence allowance; to the Committee on Finance.

DEDUCTION FOR PAYMENT OF TAX DEDUCTIBLE HOUSING EXPENSES BY MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF THE UNIFORMED SERVICES

● Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, cosponsored by Senators TOWER, GOLDWATER, JEPSEN, TRIBLE, and THURMOND, which would amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 in order to protect the total compensation packages of two of the most dedicated and worthy groups in our society: Military personnel and ministers. This bill is an identical companion to H.R. 4548, introduced in the House by my good friend and Virginia colleague, Congressman STAN PARRIS.

The Treasury Department recently approved and then delayed, until January 1985, implementation of a revenue ruling that would require members of the clergy to reduce their deductions for tax deductible housing expenses to the extent they are covered by tax-free allowances. The Internal Revenue Service is now reviewing a proposed revenue ruling that would impose the same requirement on military personnel. Revenue rulings dating back to the early 1960's had confirmed the deduction procedures which cover the clergy and the military. Although this legislation is applicable to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1982, the IRS should not construe that they can apply the current rulings retroactively to taxes paid prior to that date.

Mr. President, both these rulings will have a disastrous impact on the volunteer careers of those in the clergy or military service. Both groups have historically received modest pay. Traditionally, the Congress has provided nondenominational recognition to religious service in general by providing certain tax advantages to places of worship and clergy. All denominations are well aware of that tax benefit when they calculate the total package of compensation they provide for their ministers. Depriving them of this modest concession will only put a new burden on the already severely strained budgets of many small churches and denominations as they struggle to make up the losses.

Likewise, tax advantages are a very real and intentional part of the total compensation package we provide our military personnel. Indeed, they provide a very efficient and cost-effective means to offset some of the undesirable facts of military service. Military personnel are frequently required to move involuntarily, with no compensation for real estate expenses, a benefit commonly available to employees in the private sector in similar circumstances. The military may be required to relocate to high-cost areas, such as the Washington metropolitan area, where they find little or no Government housing available for them. Their moving expenses are generally not fully reimbursed. They face frequent and prolonged family separations. Their working conditions are frequently undesirable and hazardous. They live each day knowing that they could be called on with little notice to combat areas where they will be expected to risk their very lives for us.

Tax-free allowances such as the basic allowance for quarters and the variable housing allowance, allow us to address the special housing needs of our military personnel in the most cost-effective manner. With separate allowances, as opposed to basic pay, the needs and even variations in costs from region to region can be targeted. Making such military allowances tax free reduces the amounts Congress must appropriate to provide fairly for the targeted expenses.

Implementation of either ruling could have serious financial consequences for the affected group, especially in high-cost areas. Because the individuals affected often calculate their tax savings in determining the housing they can afford or, in many areas, must do so to be able to buy at all, it is conceivable that these rulings could actually drive some into bankruptcy. Yet, the total gain to the U.S. Treasury, though not calculated yet by the IRS or Treasury Department, is estimated by them to be relatively small.

The more insidious aspect for both groups will be the adverse impact on morale and retention. For the military in particular, this is only one more example of erosion of their benefits. The resulting influence on retention is difficult to quantify but obviously negative.

Two other large groups stand to be adversely impacted by these rulings. Homebuilders in many areas, especially where there are large concentrations of service people, tend to rely greatly on home purchasing by military people. Realtors in those same areas recognize that the steady turnover of service families and the advantages of homeownership lead to a steady base of business for them. Implementation of these rulings will make homeownership much less desirable and perhaps not cost effective when the short-term ownership mandated by frequent moves is considered.

Just as the churches would face the prospect of having to raise the pay of their clergy to offset the loss to total compensation caused by these IRS rulings, so would the Congress have to raise the basic pay of our service people to correct the damage that would be done to their total compensation package. However, raising basic pay to address the compensation loss for some would create a windfall increase in disposable income for others not affected by the ruling. Indeed, that is why I have described the current system of tax-free allowances as efficient and cost-effective tools for addressing the housing needs of all our Armed Forces personnel who do not reside in Government quarters.

Mr. President, the Congress traditionally has recognized that, based on the many sacrifices military people make, it is proper to grant them benefits not available to the civilian populace. The Congress also traditionally has recognized a similar situation for the clergy.

I urge our colleagues to join us in supporting this legislation to make explicit the intent we have already expressed.●

By Mr. PRESSLER:

S. 2520. A bill to provide authorization of appropriations for the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

INTERNATIONAL TRAVEL ACT OF 1961 AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1984

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am very pleased to introduce legislation today to reauthorize the U.S. Travel and Tourism Administration (USTTA) for fiscal year 1985.

The USTTA, and its predecessor, the U.S. Travel Service, have in recent years faced not only budget cuts, but threats against the very existence of a Federal commitment to our travel and tourism industry. This has been a most unfortunate situation, because at the same time we reduced our national tourism promotion efforts, our chief competitors strengthened their national commitments to travel and tourism.

As recently as 1981, most Western nations spent between three and five times as much on tourism promotion as the United States. It is no wonder that our share of the international travel market has dropped from a peak level of 13 percent in 1976 to about 10 percent. The drop translates to losses of billions of dollars and many thousands of jobs, losses we can ill afford, especially in troubled economic times.

Since the 1981 creation of the Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Business, Trade, and Tourism, which I chair, have sought to reverse this decline in Federal support of travel and tourism. I am gratified that so many of my colleagues have joined me in calling for a renewed national commitment to this vital industry.

The first major step toward this objective was passage of the National Tourism Policy Act of 1981. The act created the USTTA and the position of Under Secretary of Commerce for Travel and Tourism, which anchor our Federal tourism activities. To insure the level of policy coordination I envisioned when I introduced the legislation, an interagency Tourism Policy Council and a Tourism Advisory Board within the Department of Commerce were also created.

Of course, this national tourism policy could not and cannot flourish without appropriate funding. I was particularly pleased last year when my colleagues unanimously approved my USTTA authorization bill that helped pave the way for a $12 million appropriation for the USTTA for fiscal year 1984. This budget level, while still modest next to what other nations spend on tourism promotion, represents an increase of about 40 percent from the 1983 level. Unfortuntately, the $12 million level is still below that during the late 1970's when we spent over $13 million.

This funding increase has come at an opportune time since this year offers an unusual wealth of opportunity for travel promotion. Many thousands of foreign visitors will travel to the United States to attend the 1984 Louisiana World Exposition and the 1984 summer Olympic games in Los Angeles. While these events are our main drawing cards this year, the USTTA is also utilizing its funds to induce foreign travelers to visit other tourist attractions in our Nation, such as those in South Dakota that my constituents and I are so proud of. It is my hope that many foreign visitors will come to my home State to enjoy its natural beauty and the warmth and friendliness of its citizens.

The bill I am introducing today would authorize $14 million for the USTTA for fiscal year 1985. I hope my colleagues share my feeling that strengthening our national commitment to travel and tourism will more than pay for itself by improving our trade balance, boosting employment, and contributing to international good will.

This legislation is also designed to bring the USTTA closer to all the American people and citizens of every nation. Regional USTTA offices would be created within the United States so that even the smallest businesses, those so often neglected by the Federal Government, and the people and businesses farthest from Washington, D.C., will have better access to USTTA services. Similarly, the legislation provides for USTTA training of employees in U.S. embassies abroad, so that we can better utilize our presence in each nation to promote travel opportunities to and within the United States.

Again, I thank my colleagues for all their previous support of travel and tourism, and I invite you all to join me in working to further strengthen our national commitment to tourism, and thereby strengthen our Nation.

By Mr. HATCH:

S. 2521. A bill to authorize appropriations for the National Science Foundation for fiscal year 1985; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION AUTHORIZATION ACT FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, it pleases me to introduce the National Science Foundation Authorization Act of fiscal year 1985.

For 34 years the National Science Foundation has promoted the progress in science and engineering through the support of high quality basic and applied research programs designed to advance our understanding of the fundamental laws of nature as well as to utilize science and technology for problem solving. NSF's educational programs are aimed at insuring increasing competence in science at all educational levels and an adequate supply of well-qualified scientists and engineers to meet our country's needs today and in the future.

The benefits of NSF programs of the National Science Foundation can be found everywhere. In Utah, for example, NSF supported the development of polymers in artificial blood vessels and the Jarvik 7 artificial heart. NSF supported chemical research that has led to the development of higher density computer chips. This is the type of basic research that will keep this country in front of technological development.

Additionally, NSF announced 200 Presidential Young Investigator awards in fiscal year 1984, which will help America's universities attract and keep outstanding faculty members who might otherwise pursue nonacademic careers. More than 100 small businesses are awarded NSF grants each year to investigate and develop science applications that promote national and international commerce, create jobs, and generally improve our overall quality of life. An expanded effort to upgrade the quality of science and mathematics education in our schools has been initiated and funds are requested for it to continue.

This bill reflects the commitment of President Reagan to the continued pursuit of scientific and educational excellence. It reflects the keen understanding of our Government that economic growth, an improved international trade position, and national security are tightly interwoven with American efforts in scientific research and development and the significant advances in knowledge and technology that result from this research.

Our Federal budget is a tight one, but NSF's important mission, which lays the foundation for advances that will improve our long-term economic position as well as our scientific knowledge deserves our wholehearted support.

This measure proposes an authorization of $1.5 billion for fiscal 1985. This is an increase of $180 million, or 13.6 percent, from the fiscal 1984 NSF operating plan. This increase will permit continued support of outstanding basic research in all scientific disciplines, and will allow increased emphasis in several specific areas of growing importance: Advanced computing, instrumentation and equipment, engineering research, and science and engineering education. I ask unanimous consent that the highlights of NSF's fiscal year 1985 budget plan be included in the RECORD at this point.

Mr. President, I support this measure and hope that it can be expeditiously enacted. As my colleagues know, the authorization process has been stalled now for 3 years due to jurisdictional negotiations with the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation. The last NSF authorization passed was in 1980 for fiscal year 1981. I fear this persistent lack of a public law giving congressional sanction to NSF's activities may be misinterpreted as a reflection of the importance we attach to both the programs and purposes of the Foundation.

The Labor and Human Resources Committee has never failed to provide oversight of the Foundation or to report annual authorizing legislation by the May 15 deadline.

While I sincerely commend my distinguished colleagues on the Commerce Committee, especially Senator GORTON, for their attention to this issue and for a willingness to work out an equitable agreement, I hope that the Senate will also be able to do its job by passing an NSF authorization bill, going to conference with the House, and sending a bill to the President. As our able majority and minority leaders know, if we were to delay consideration on every bill for 3 years pending accommodations with all interested parties, we might just as well go into permanent recess. Some things can be worked out and some things cannot. I certainly do not blame anyone for pursuing jurisdiction of the NSF; it is a well-administered, responsive agency with a critical mission that ought to be of interest to all of us. Senator GORTON, as chairman of the Science, Technology, and Space Subcommittee, has discussed this matter in good faith and I appreciate and respect that. But we must move ahead with this bill, welcoming the contributions of our Commerce Committee colleagues in the form of a committee report, hearing record, or amendments offered on the Senate floor.

Mr. President, the National Science Foundation performs a vital function for our Nation, one which should not be neglected by the Senate any longer. I urge all Senators to support enactment of this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the highlights of National Science Foundation programs for fiscal year 1985 and the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HIGHLIGHTS OF NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION PROGRAMS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1985

Mathematical and Physical Sciences (MPS) support is $416.7 million, an increase of $57.9 million, or 16.1 percent, over the fiscal year 1984 current plan. The enhanced program will provide for:

Substantial improvement in the support of graduate and postdoctoral students, including the Mathematical Sciences Postdoctoral Fellowship Program, and for expanded research activities in computational mathematics and statistics and for access to appropriate computational facilities.

Strengthened support in computer research to respond to new research opportunities generated as a result of the experimental computer research facilities developed over the last five years.

Continued revitalization of university physics research through provision of new research instrumentation and improved computing capabilities to active research groups and a sharp focus on provision of new incentives and research opportunities for young researchers.

Expanded research opportunities in chemistry in areas presenting significant promise for rapid advancement, with special emphasis on the chemistry of life processes.

Strengthening the training of future materials scientists and engineers, particularly in technologically important areas such as electronic materials, ceramics, and polymers.

Support through formal or informal programs for the acquisition of research instrumentation and equipment for group or departmental use. Support for special equipment is increased by $3.9 million, or 19.1 percent, to a total of $24.3 million.

Increased support for research, operations, and instrumentation at university laboratories in computer research, physics, and materials research by $10.0 million, or 18.5 percent, to a total of $64.8 million.

Support for national facilities such as the Mathematical Sciences and Theoretical Physics Institutes, the Cornell Electron Storage Ring, the Michigan State University Heavy Ion Accelerator, Synchrotron Radiation facilities, and the National Magnet Laboratory, is increased by $5.8 million or 12.6 percent, to a total of $52.0 million.

Engineering support for fiscal year 1985 is $147.1 million, an increase of $26.4 million, or 22 percent over the fiscal year 1984 current plan. Within this amount research support in all areas will increase with:

Added emphasis on microstructure fabrication research, integrated optical devices, automated design, microsensors, and robotics to aid the handicapped, and optimization methods for production scheduling in industrial processes.

Stronger research efforts in biotechnology, novel processing techniques, catalytic reaction engineering, microcontamination control, and plasma-chemical processing.

Special support in coastal and ocean engineering, problems of repair, retrofit, and rehabilitation of parts of the public infrastructure, and upgrading and modernization of experimental facilities used in earthquake engineering.

Increased emphasis in thermal systems, tribiology, biomechanics and robotics/automated manufacturing.

Advanced Scientific Computing's increase of $3.5 million, from $1.5 to $5 million, is spread over all the subactivities and reflects engineering efforts devoted to the Foundation-wide initiative which began in fiscal year 1984 to provide access to advanced computer facilities for researchers from all disciplines.

Centers for Cross-Disciplinary Research in Engineering, a $10 million initiative spread over all the subactivities, will be established to conduct research on problems of importance to industry while simultaneously educating graduate and undergraduate students in engineering practice.

Astronomical, Atmospheric, Earth, and Ocean Sciences (AAEO) support is $373.5 million, an increase of $43.5 million or 13.2 percent over the fiscal year 1984 current plan. In addition to substantial research project support this provides for:

Initiation of the first phase of a major new program, the acquisition of the Very Long Baseline Array (VLBA).

Beginning the first-phase acquisition of the Advanced Vector Computer (AVC) to be based at the National Center for Atmospheric Research, and allows for continued payments towards the mass storage system.

Major upgrading of instrumentation and a major research thrust on the chemistry, structure, and geologic history of the continental lithosphere, continued continental reflection profiling (COCORP) operations, and preliminary site surveys prerequiste to deep continental drilling.

Emphasis on studies of the ocean floor, maintenance and upgrading of shipboard scientific equipment, and commencement of the first year of an international drilling program using a large, modern drillship.

Advanced Scientific Computing, will provide increased access to advanced computers as well as local facilities to take advantage of the contributions that advanced computer use can make to AAEO disciplines.

U.S. Antarctic Program (USAP) for fiscal year 1985 is $115.1 million, an increase of $12.6 million or 12.3 percent above the fiscal year 1984 current plan. Within this total:

A $0.8 million increase will provide for a greater number of research awards with new initiatives in glaciology and oceanography.

Reimbursement of the Department of Defense (DOD) for military retirement costs is included for the first time.

Equipment procurement and facilities upgrading and maintenance that was deferred in prior years will be continued.

Biological, Behavioral, and Social Sciences (BBS) support is $253.1 million, an increase of $28.4 million or 12.7 percent above the fiscal year 1984 current plan. This will allow:

Continued emphasis in the plant sciences to advance the understanding of plants through application of both contemporary molecular and cellular approaches and instrumentation technologies. Additional emphasis will be placed on research using genetic methods to examine fundamental biological questions and the chemistry of biological processes.

Strengthened research efforts in the plant sciences, including research on the role of plant toxins in controlling damage by insects and on plant adaptation to nutrient limitations. Emphasis will be placed on augmenting awards to permit use of instrumentation and material essential for the application of molecular genetic techniques to studies of systematics and population biology.

Increased attention to studies of human origins, the learning process, and the development of cognitive capacities, including language.

The extension of key socioeconomic data resources and a strengthening of related methodological and theoretical research.

Expansion of Advanced Scientific Computing to $2.4 million to provide for communications links and network facilities and support for local user costs, such as software, technical support, and auxiliary equipment.

Scientific, Technological, and International Affairs (STIA) support will be $46.9 million, an increase of $6.1 million or 14.9 percent above the fiscal year 1984 current plan. SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY

Section 1. This section provides that an application for Federal insurance shall include an agreement by the applicant to pay and maintain the 1 percent deposit in the Share Insurance Fund (SIF) required by this legislation.

Section 2. This section requires each insured credit union to include in its certified statement to the NCUA Board the amount of its 1 percent deposit or adjustment thereof.

Section 3. This section establishes a refundable deposit in the Share Insurance Fund of 1 percent of each credit union's insured shares. It further defines the terms and conditions surrounding this 1 percent deposit including: the NCUA Board's discretion to phase-in the deposit; the annual adjustment of the deposit; the refund of the deposit, if the credit union is no longer insured by the SIF, or if the SIF is moved from the NCUA; the terms of the refund; clarification that no refund will occur in the event of liquidation due to bankruptcy or insolvency; and authority for the NCUA Board to use the deposit to meet expenses and to require replenishment of the deposit if necessary.

This section also removes certain language from the present statute that was only necessary to initially implement Federal insurance for credit unions.

Section 4. This section provides that the NCUA Board, each year, shall return to credit unions on a pro rata basis all funds not required to maintain the SIF at its "normal operating level."

Section 5. This section deletes from the present statute the authority for the NCUA Board to assess a second (special) premium.

Section 6. This section adds the 1 percent deposit to those provisions of the Act pertaining to: (1) the NCUA Board's bringing a suit against a credit union to require a report of condition or certified statement; (2) penalties against credit unions for failure to pay the deposit; and (3) prohibition against credit unions paying dividends when in default on payment of 1 percent deposit.

Section 7. This section requires the inclusion of information on the 1 percent deposit in the records of the credit union.

Section 8. This section gives the NCUA Board flexibility in establishing the dates of the insurance year.

Section 9. This section changes the normal operating level of the SIF from 1 percent of all insured shares to 1.3 percent.

Section 10. This section establishes that no premium is assessed on amounts in any account in excess of the insured limit.

Section 11. This section provides that the 1 percent deposit collected by the NCUA Board shall be deposited in the SIF. It further requires the NCUA Board to make an annual report to the Banking Committees regarding the operating level of the SIF. Such report will include the results of an independent audit of the SIF.

Section 12. This section provides that a credit union shall maintain its 1 percent deposit in the SIF during the one year period following termination of insurance. It further provides, however, that my mutual consent of the NCUA Board and the credit union, all account insurance may cease immediately upon the effective date of comparable insurance from another source.

Section 13. This section corrects an oversight in the enabling statute by providing a tax exemption to the NCUA Central Liquidity Facility. It is retroactive to the date the Facility opened—October 1, 1979.

Section 14. This section amends 31 U.S.C. § 3332(b) to require the Federal government to absorb the administrative costs incurred in processing up to three allotment checks per pay day for Federal civilian employees.●

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall take effect on July 1, 1984.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am introducing this legislation today to amend the Senate Finance Committee's version of the truck use tax schedule. I expect that the committee will report language recommending that we change the Surface Transportation Assistance Act's $1,900 use tax increase scheduled to begin to go into effect July 1, 1984, and replace it with a $600 use tax plus a 6-cents diesel tax. This is a step in the right direction—but as I said in my testimony before the Finance Committee when similar language was debated last February—it is still a far cry from the reality of the transportation industry, especially in rural America.

My amendment would eliminate user fee increases and return to pre-Surface Transportation Assistance Act levels. I recently chaired Senate hearings in Sioux Falls, S. Dak., to assess the condition of the trucking industry. It was not a very rosy picture. One of the chief concerns of those testifying was the devastating impact that the heavy user tax would have on their industry and their customers. Not only would it cripple thousands more small trucking firms, but this would result in higher consumer costs for virtually every product hauled by truck. The tax would not be a big problem for the larger firms. It is the smaller operators that would be hardest hit. It would also play a big role in discouraging new firms from entering the industry. The effect of this kind of taxation, in conjunction with the problems caused by deregulation, is to drift further and further toward a monopolistic industry at the expense of thousands of small operators.

Many of the smaller truckers in America—especially in States like South Dakota—travel fewer than 50,000 miles per year. Some travel approximately 100,000 miles. But trucks of most big trucking companies travel much further, as a general rule, in the same year. To charge them all the same base rate per year is grossly unfair; but then to add insult to injury by calling it an equitable tax based on an accurate cost allocation is simply outrageous.

Let me use an actual example of a typical independent trucker from South Dakota to illustrate this problem. Last year, he traveled just under 50,000 miles. His truck consumed diesel fuel at 5 miles per gallon, for a total of 10,000 gallons. He has shown me his financial records, and I can assure you that a $1,600 to $1,900 one-time use tax would probably put him out of business. Applying the $600 plus 6 cents per gallon Department of Transportation compromise, he will still be forced to pay $1,200 in additional taxes. In his case, we could just as well leave the $1,600 to $1,900 tax in place, because our gradual approach will only prolong the agony of an inevitable end.

Mr. President, I do not propose to eliminate the revenue source needed to rebuild our deteriorating transportation system. Indeed, I believe it is important that our final legislation be revenue neutral. The amendment I am offering today meets that criteria. Very simply, it would return to the pre-Surface Transportation Assistance Act heavy user fee level with a maximum fee of $240 and retain the committee's recommended 6 cents per gallon diesel fuel tax—with cars and small trucks exempt. This proposal would raise the same amount of money as either the Surface Transportation Assistance Act or the Finance Committee proposal. But at the same time, it would protect smaller businesses by allowing them to pay the tax on a pay-as-you-go basis.

We hear a lot of talk about cost allocation and equity when we debate this issue, but it is hard to comprehend a more unequitable proposal than one which would charge a small operator who travels 40,000 to 50,000 miles per year the same amount as a huge, long-haul operation which runs its trucks two, three, and four times that amount in the same year. This would be patently unfair and, by definition, grossly inequitable.

I am introducing this legislation today because I believe it is important to get this proposal on the table for full analysis when we debate this issue in detail later this month. I urge my colleagues to support this amendment, and work toward a fair and truly equitable solution to this important problem.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE SCIENCE OF YELLOW RAIN

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President Evelyn Murray, a tireless opponent of nerve gas weapons production, recently brought the following article to my attention. It serves as the foundation for the current scientific study of the Reagan administration charge that the Soviet Union employed chemical weapons in Southeast Asia. In the case presented to Congress during discussion of nerve gas weapons production funding in the fiscal year 1984 Department of Defense appropriations bill, the administration pointed to evidence of "Yellow Rain" in Southeast Asia. Because it is obvious that the Soviet violated the 1925 Geneva protocol on chemical weapons and the 1972 treaty on biological and toxic weapons, argued proponents, the United States must renew production of nerve gas weapons to maintain a suficient deterrent. In assuming the obvious, however, the administration ignored the most basic requirement of science: Proof. The following article could shed profound light on the allegations. "Yellow Rain" by Louis Ember was published in the January 9, 1984 edition of Chemical and Engineering News.

The article follows:

[From the Chemical and Engineering News, Jan. 9, 1984]

THE SCIENCE OF YELLOW RAIN

The entire June 6, 1983, issue of C&EN examined the uncertainties over the health effects of dioxin in the environment. Similarly, this issue is largely devoted to another matter involving chemicals in the environment: yellow rain.

Yellow rain is the imprecise name given to toxin-based weapons the U.S. government charges the Soviet Union and its allies of using in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan. The editorial in the June 6 issue described the dioxin matter as "a brew of uncertain science, unanswered and sometimes unanswerable health questions, regulatory dilemmas, intensive press coverage, and legal maneuverings." As it turns out, that description fits the yellow rain issue too.

The U.S. charge is in keeping with the Reagan Administration's characterization of the Soviet Union as the "focus of evil in the modern world." It is also an incredibly serious charge. It undermines all arms negotiations because it accuses the Soviet Union of flagrant violation of both the 1925 Geneva Protocol on chemical weapons and the 1972 treaty on biological and toxin weapons.

In view of the critical nature of this issue, it would not be unreasonable to expect that the U.S. has an irrefutably strong case to support its charges, and, especially, that the supporting science is sound. But this is not the case.

When Secretary of State Alexander Haig first accused the Soviets in September 1981, the only scientific evidence in hand was the unconfirmed finding by one laboratory of parts-per-million quantities of three trichothecene toxins on a single leaf and stem taken from an alleged chemical attack site in Kampuchea. To this day the sum total of physical evidence from Afghanistan consists of a trace amount of a trichothecene on the face of a gas mask obtained—apparently purchased—in Kabul. The total of government-obtained positive environmental samples from Southeast Asia has grown only to five. These all have been reported by one private laboratory. None have been confirmed by independent analyses. The Army has failed to find trichothecenes in more than 50 such samples it has tested. And evidence from biomedical samples from alleged victims is ambiguous.

The government claims that it is very difficult to obtain physical evidence of chemical warfare from remote and wartorn areas to which it has no access and that its scientific effort should not be judged by the standards of a Ph. D. thesis. This is reasonable. But it does not explain why the scientific case the government has tendered publicly has been so poorly presented, why it lacks the normal cross-checks, and why elements of it have been at variance with data already in the scientific literature. It also does not explain the lack of serious response to issues raised by knowledgeable scientists. But it does reflect a contempt for good science shown by some within the State Department.

The government implies that it really does not need the science, that it can prove its case with an overwhelming volume of eyewitness reports and classified data. This is disingenuous First, the government did not go public with its charges until it had the first "smoking gun" evidence in hand. And, second, it is very difficult to conceive how it can substantiate its central thesis that the Soviet Union is behind the use of toxin weapons in Southeast Asia without the science.

Government scientists investigating yellow rain have been in an unenviable position ever since Haig first went public with his charge. This position becomes more difficult with every repetition of the charge. The uncertainties over the science of yellow rain cannot be left unresolved. Until they are settled, they cloud the issue of whether treaty-violating chemical of any kind have been used in recent times in Southeast Asia. A first step should be a peer review of the government's yellow rain case by an independent panel of scientists, conducted in an open manner and with access to as much of the intelligence as can prudently be declassified.

MICHAEL HEYLIN,
Editor.

YELLOW RAIN

For years, and from faraway places have come reports of death and sickness from the skies. The tales from ruggedly independent and mostly illiterate mountain people of Laos, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan tell of aircraft-, rocket-, and artillery-delivered clouds of yellowish material that killed rapidly and grotesquely those directly hit. Villagers more fortunate and further away became ill, but with a strange combination of symptoms.

Survivors often told tales of mysterious yellow rainlike spots on or near their villages that they called yellow rain and associated with deaths and illnesses. These tales spurred U.S. investigations. First U.S. embassy personnel collected the victims' grim stories. Then military physicians examined these people, now in refugee camps, for signs of chemical agents used. And finally, the U.S. launched an intensified search for physical evidence.

From the early surveys came the speculation that three possible agents—a harassing agent, a nerve gas, and an unknown chemical—were being used. Chemical analysis of collected material proved futile. No traditional chemical agent—no riot control gas, mustard gas, or nerve gas—could be detected. And still the reports of skin irritation and lesions, of bloody diarrhea and vomiting, of dizziness and trembling, and of death flooded local embassies after alleged yellow rain attacks. The mysterious toxic agent causing these symptoms remained elusive to the chemist's probe for seven years.

Then on Sept. 13, 1981, in West Germany, Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig addressed the Berlin Press Association. In an otherwise unnotable speech, Haig said: "For some time now, the international community has been alarmed by continuing reports that the Soviet Union and its allies have been using lethal chemical weapons in Laos, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan. . . . We now have physical evidence from Southeast Asia which has been analyzed and found to contain abnormally high levels of three potent mycotoxins—poisonous substances not indigenous to the region and which are highly toxic to man and animals."

With these words, amplified the next day by undersecretary of State for political affairs Walter J. Stoessel and U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, an obscure issue was thrust into the spotlight.

The physical evidence that Haig referred to turned out to be a single leaf and twig from Kampuchea. This vegetation was contaminated with parts-per-million quantities of three trichothecene toxins, substances produced by Fusarium fungi. This detection of fungal toxins, or mycotoxins, was the smoking gun evidence the government needed to charge the Soviet Union publicly with waging or abetting biochemical warfare against unprotected peoples in widely scattered areas of the world, and thus with grievous violations of two international arms treaties.

Yet this first piece of physical evidence, says a government official with access to classified information, was not the sole basis for Haig's charge. The U.S. government already had in hand numerous and compelling refugee and eyewitness accounts, reports of medical personnel and aid workers treating alleged victims, defector testimony, and a wealth of classified intelligence data. But the finding of toxins did help to explain the ills and deaths reported by individuals allegedly exposed to chemical warfare.

When trichothecenes subsequently were found in other environmental samples collected from attack sites, and in blood, urine, and other tissue samples from alleged victims—but not from control samples—the government became even more convinced the loop of evidence was closed. It is today so certain its case for Soviet-linked toxin warfare is solid, airtight, and unshakable that the charge often has been repeated by President Reagan in recent months. The President, however, merely has been restating what is explicitly spelled out in several State Department reports to the UN.

As these reports make abundantly clear, the core of the Administration's case is that:

Trichothecene toxins do not occur naturally in Southeast Asia, the locale for the majority of reported chemical attacks.

The levels of trichothecenes recorded in yellow rain samples are greater than those reported for natural outbreaks, and the toxins are not normally found in the combinations reported. Also, there is no history of trichothecene-induced illnesses in Southeast Asia.

The symptoms noted by the Hmong of Laos, the Khmer of Kampuchea, and the freedom fighters of Afghanistan fit the known effects of these toxins in humans and animals.

The finding of mycotoxins in biomedical samples taken from victims confirms the connection between their illnesses and their exposure to yellow rain.

In addition, the government originally argued that: no local Indochina facility exists that can produce the mold and extract the mycotoxins in the quantities being used; the Soviets have such facilities, many under military control; they have long done research on these toxins; and their military doctrine permits toxin use in war. With those givens, the U.S. argues, the Soviets have to be supplying their Asian allies, the Laotians and Vietnamese, and using the toxins themselves against the Afghan resistance.

The U.S. never has wavered from these basic tenets even when critics have pointed out errors, weaknesses, and inconsistencies in the scientific evidence. The government's response to such criticisms has been adamant and creative. Science, the government says, may never be able to provide unequivocal proof of chemical warfare in remote, war-torn areas because of the difficulties of sample collection. Still, the government avers, the scientific evidence presented so far—though not of the caliber of, say, a Ph.D. thesis—is more than sufficient to confirm the overwhelming volume of other evidence.

Even more to the point, the U.S. says that its critics have yet to come up with a better explanation for the presence of mycotoxins in the samples that have been reported. And assailing its critics still further, the U.S. points out that these "armchair" faultfinders have not been on the scene at areas under attack; that they have done little or no research to support their alternative hypotheses; and that at least some of them have ulterior motives. There are even officials within the State Department, a lead government agency in this matter, who show contempt for science in general, and for what science can contribute to this issue in particular.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S CASE

The government's case has not been entirely consistent. There have been hints of the use of toxins other than the mycotoxins found in the samples, often in combination with other, unspecified chemical agents. There are many eyewitness reports of various colored smokes as well as the yellow, rainlike drops. But the basic charge of Soviet complicity in the use of mycotoxin weapons has never varied.

The Administration has dismissed any explanation that purports a natural origin for the toxins. For example, the U.S. deems preposterous a Soviet thesis that earlier U.S. herbicide spraying in Indochina changed the ecology enough to allow the lush growth of elephant grass, a fine substrate for toxin-producing Fusarium fungi. In this, the UN, which has conducted its own investigation of yellow rain, concurs with the U.S. The State Department scoffs at a proposal that yellow rain may, in fact, be bee feces, though it has yet to explain the presence of pollen grains in every toxin-containing environmental sample examined for pollen. That foodstuffs may be infested with Fusarium mold, a possible source for toxins in the biomedical samples, is considered unlikely, though food has yet to be tested in any meaningful way. Toxin-infested grains are known to have caused thousands of deaths in several incidents in the Soviet Union and elswhere but not yet in Southeast Asia.

The Administration may be correct in dismissing these possibilities. It may be correct in saying that some form of chemical warfare is being waged against Hmong, Khmer, and Afghan freedom fighters. Certainly the reports of sudden, massive, and agonizing death have been flowing persistently from Laos since 1975, from Kampuchea since 1979, and from Afghanistan since the Soviet military intervention in 1979. But, based on its released physical and sociological data, the U.S. has made a less than compelling case that the toxins identified in collected samples are man-made weapons of war, and that the Soviet Union is implicated in such warfare.

The grand total of positive physical evidence gathered by the U.S. is slight: five environmental and 20 biomedical samples (including some tissues from an autopsy) from Southeast Asia, plus one contaminated gas mask from Afghanistan. That adds up to less than 10% of all samples tested. But, not only is there a paucity of positives, there are also some disturbing problems with this meager lot and, for that matter, with all the samples collected.

Sample pedigrees either are not known or suspect. Controls are insufficient in number and/or inappropriate in character. Except for the Afghan gas mask, and some autopsy material, all positive samples have been analyzed by one private laboratory and have not been confirmed independently. The Army laboratory analyzing environmental samples has never detected toxins in the numerous specimens from Southeast Asia it has tested—never. In fact, the one environmental sample that contained the highest level of T-2 toxin reported was reanalyzed by this Army laboratory and found to contain no toxin. There are no environmental and biomedical samples from a single alleged attack. And the U.S. has no physical evidence that trichothecenes have been used in a weapons system. Not one piece of military hardware—not a shell, grenade, rocket, canister, or weapon fragment—has tested positive for toxins.

If the physical evidence is insubstantial and questionable, the refugee reports are even more inadequate. Southeast Asian scholars who have examined the reports claim that the refugee material has been poorly collected and organized, mainly because the interviews have been conducted by personnel ignorant of the basic rules of sound sociological research. They claim the questions asked of refugees appear to have assumed chemical warfare and were, therefore, leading. Also, they assert, refugee responses have never been considered in the context of social background. And finally, it is not clear from the material released that refugee interviews have been internally cross-checked or cross-referenced with other data, although the U.S. claims they have.

Of course, the government has classified intelligence data. However, this is neither knowable nor judicable. Hence, it is of limited use to the government in its public effort to convince the world of treaty violations by the Soviets.

To make a credible case for toxins as weapons of war, the government has to demonstrate that the trichothecenes it has found are not of natural origin. At a minimum, it must show that Fusarium fungi, present in Southeast Asia, are not producers of these trichothecene toxins, that pollen is not a substrate for naturally occurring toxin-producing fungi, and that moldy food is not the source of the trichothecenes found in human tissues and the cause of sickness now associated with chemical warfare.

The U.S. also has to reconcile the findings of a recently uncovered 1977 Chinese paper that reports that yellow rain is bee feces. And the government must explain why Hmong reported deaths from the herbicides sprayed by the U.S. in Laos in the early 1970s, and why the Cambodians accused the U.S. and South Vietnam of spraying a lethal yellow powder on some of its villages in 1964. In addition, the U.S. has to explain why no foreign country has come forward with analytical results—not vague statements of evidence—that support its case.

Despite the need for a valid scientific exercise—as constrained as that may have to be under the circumstances—science instead appears to have become captive to Administration policy. No matter how contorted the science has had to become, every government utterance made after Haig's speech has supported the charge that the Soviets, sometimes through allies, are perpetrating a holocaust on hapless tribesmen by illegally conducting biochemical warfare.

Officially the Administration considers resolved the question of whether toxin warfare has occurred. Only arms control implications need now be pondered. Says Col. James Leonard, a politico-military affairs officer at the State Department: "This is not a scientific problem of the first order, and it can't be treated that way. The U.S. is involved with an arms control verification problem."

One in government who thinks otherwise is Lt. Col. Charles (Denny) Lane. He was assistant Army attaché at the U.S. Embassy in Bangkok from 1980 to 1983. During that period, Lane interviewed many of the Hmong fleeing Laos. He says the experience left him "quizzical." There are a "lot of unanswered questions," he explains. And these "are primarily scientific and have to be addressed by the scientific community."

SEARCHING FOR THE PUTATIVE AGENT

The scientific task has not been easy. And initially the government "had to 'ad hoc' the issue," says Carolyn Stettner of the Arms Control & Disarmament Agency. She should know because she also sits on an interagency intelligence task force chaired by Central Intelligence Agency officer Christopher (Kit) Green, which is monitoring the yellow rain issue. Stettner says that at the beginning there was "no formal mechanism set up to call together a team of experts" to puzzle out the problem.

The failure to detect traditional chemical agents indicated that the agents being used either were too short-lived to be detected days to weeks after an event, or were compounds never before used.

Small-molecular-weight toxins were considered a possibility by a medically trained CIA officer who had done field work in or near Laos, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan. But most government people involved in the issue credit Sharon Watson, a Ph.D. toxicologist and an intelligence research specialist for the Armed Forces Medical Intelligence Center, with first suggesting that trichothecene toxins produced by Fusarium fungi might be the agents causing the symptoms noted by alleged victims.

Her hypothesis was tested on a leaf and stem taken from the site of an alleged March 1981 attack on a Kampuchean hamlet near the Thai border—the physical evidence cited by Haig in his Berlin speech. Three trichothecenes—T-2 toxin, nivalenol, and deoxynivalenol (DON)—were identified by University of Minnesota plant pathologist Chester J. Mirocha. As Watson's thesis now seemed confirmed, the government began looking for trichothecenes in other environmental samples as well as in blood and urine samples taken from refugees who claimed to have become ill after a chemical attack.

Though additional chemical analyses were under way, at this point in fall 1981, the only publicly released data were the quantities of three toxins on a leaf and stem. This slim evidence left many scientists skeptical. One was Rutgers University food scientist Joseph D. Rosen, who since has tested a scraping of yellow powder obtained from Laos by ABC News, and who now believes that toxin warfare is being conducted. He says one piece of evidence—an analysis performed by only one lab, and with no controls reported—was too shaky a platform from which to charge the Soviets with perfidy.

According to Thomas Dashiell, a staff specialist for chemical technology with the Defense Department, that platform is being shored up. "We have been starting essentially from a zero science base. And we are continuing to build a scientific base on these mycotoxins that will be credible in the community."

The U.S. has tested about 100 environmental samples for trichothecenes. Mycotoxins have been found in five samples collected from sites of alleged attacks in Laos and Kampuchea. All control samples collected from areas near but not at attack sites have been found to be toxin-free. Emery William Sarver, chief of the methodology research team analyzing yellow rain samples at the Army's Chemical Systems Laboratory, has not identified a single toxin in any of the myriad samples he has tested. All positive U.S. environmental (and biomedical) samples have been reported by Mirocha. Other than Mirocha, only Rosen, who analyzed a nongovernmental sample, has reported the presence of toxins. And directly or through an intermediary, Mirocha has received all his samples from Watson.

Why Mirocha, according to Watson, is batting five-for-six in finding toxins in environmental samples from Southeast Asia, whereas Sarver is batting about zero-for-60 is yet to be explained.

MYCOTOXINS AS WEAPONS OF WAR

The government contends that the positive sample contain toxins at levels higher than those found in natural infestations. Yet it is hard to know what to make of this claim. Besides the obvious problem of not being able to verify that samples have, in fact, been collected from sites the government claims to have obtained them, the actual collectors of the samples have never been identified. Further, descriptions have never been released of how samples have been maintained in transit from collector to analyst. Contamination and even spiking of samples before the government received them cannot be excluded.

More important, it is unclear what the quantitative values attached to samples—the parts per million or parts per billion—mean.

In the government's most revealing statement to date—a paper published last November in the Journal of the Association of Official Analytical Chemists [66, 1485 (1983)]—Mirocha, Watson, and coauthors do not describe their method of quantitation. They list concentrations of toxins found, and they hint but do not tell how they obtained these figures, says Catherine Fenselau, an analytical chemist at Johns Hopkins University and editor of Biomedical Mass Spectrometry.

Fenselau says that Mirocha did identify trichothecenes qualitatively in some alleged yellow rain samples. Sarver adds that because most collected samples are small, and the chemical analysis itself is fraught with problems, the U.S.-reported results should "very definitely" be regarded as more qualitative than quantitative. Yet a major tenet of the government's case—that the amounts of trichothecenes are too high for natural occurrence—has vincing.

However, assume for a moment that Mirocha can quantitate his analyses. The values he reports range from a low of 0.030 ppm to a high of 143 ppm: Scatter is wide, and replication is nil. Most of his numbers fall within the range of the high levels of trichothecene toxins that have been reported for natural infestations of food and feed grains in Australia, Canada, France, West Germany, India, Japan, and the U.S. For example, Japan has reported 40.4 ppm of deoxynivalenol, and 36.9 ppm of nivalenol in barley, and West Germany has reported 31.5 ppm of diacetoxyscirpenol (DAS) in corn.

The U.S. also maintains that mycotoxins have been reported in combinations never found in nature. This, too, is questionable in the light of other data. These show some species of Fusaria to be copious producers of two or more of the yellow rain toxins.

For instance, a French group in 1978 reported isolating T-2 toxin, nivalenol, and DON from trichothecene-infested corn, a finding that indicates, at least, the simultaneous production of toxin by several Fusarium species. J. David Miller, a mycologist with Agriculture Canada, [Canada's equivalent of the USDA], and his colleagues were able to coax the simultaneous production of DON, DAS, and T-2 toxin from an isolate of Fusarium graminearum, and DAS and T-2 toxin from Fusarium sporotrichiodes. As sporotrichiodes have been found in Southeast Asia, there is reason to assume that the T-2 toxin and DAS identified in yellow rain samples may be of natural origin. Also, a Japanese group headed by Yoshio Ueno, who is now at Nagoya Institute of Technology, reported that Fusarium tricinctum and F. roseum both produce T-2 toxin and DAS.

Even Mirocha in a 1981 interview with C&EN didn't discount the possibility of a Fusarium species producing what the government now terms unusual combinations of toxins. "It's hard to say that none of them will ever do this. We never really had extensive studies," he said.

The trichothecene toxins in U.S. samples have been scraped off rocks, detected in water, and brushed off leaves. Mirocha and Watson say this indicates a manmade origin for the toxins, since these are not normal substrates for Fusaria, and Fusaria are not leaf pathogens.

On the other hand, Rodney D. Caldwell, a mycologist at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, points out that three Fusarium species—roseum, nivale, and poae—have been described as leaf pathogens. Last year, Thai scientists at Mahidol University isolated Fusarium semitectum var. semitectum from yellow spots on leaves collected in Thailand near the Kampuchean border. A crude extract of the fungus injected into mice killed them, indicating that the fungus was producing toxin, possibly even a trichothecene. Paul E. Nelson, a plant pathologist and Fusarium expert at Pennsylvania State University, says Fusaria are not normally leaf pathogens, and the Thai scientists haven't proved that they are. F. semitectum does colonize leaves in the tropics, he acknowledges, but whether it produces toxin is still an open question. The Thai scientists, he points out, induced toxin production in a laboratory, not in nature.

To clinch the argument that the toxins found in yellow rain samples are not of natural origin, the U.S. claimed initially that Fusaria are not indigenous to Southeast Asia because it is tropical, and hence any detection of trichothecenes is proof of weapon use. That argument advanced by Watson on the basis of an incomplete literature search, soon fell by the wayside.

This error might not have been made had Mirocha been consulted. In a 1981 interview, he told C&EN, "The organism Fusarium and its various species are found throughout the world. . . . Fusaria without question absolutely are found in the tropics. . . . It is a very serious pathogen in Central America, very destructive to the banana plant."

It has been known since at least 1939 that Fusaria occur naturally in Southeast Asia. Then French mycologist Francis Bugnicourt documented their presence in his doctoral thesis. In addition to the Thais who have isolated one species of toxic Fusarium, Canadian mycologists recently isolated two species (F. semitectum and F. sporotrichiodes) from samples collected near the Thai-Kampuchean border; both are known toxin producers in temperate climes and under some lab conditions. Whether they produce toxins in the tropics is not known.

That, however, may be the wrong question. More pertinent is whether Fusaria are present at the high altitudes the Hmong call home, and whether they produce toxins under the climatic conditions at these heights. The temperatures at the mountaintops more closely resemble the temperate zones favored by toxin-producing Fusaria, a fact always overlooked in U.S. statements.

Even though the major arguments for a man-made origin for these mycotoxins seem to have been diminished by the weight of scientific evidence, the U.S. still insists that its small number of positive environmental samples are scientifically impressive. A close examination of the results reported on each sample, each with its own set of thorny problems, reveals otherwise.

A CLOSE LOOK AT FIVE SAMPLES

The first leaf and stem collected from a Kampuchean attack in March 1981 was split into two samples by Watson's group, and one was spiked with 400 ppm of T-2 toxin. When Mirocha received them through an intermediary in July, each weighed 200 mg. He extracted the whole samples, cleaned up the extracts using a ferric-gel procedure, prepared the extracts for analysis by converting them into trimethylsilyl ether derivatives, and analyzed the derivatives for toxins using gas chromatography combined with mass spectrometry in the selected ion mode.

He monitored two peaks and chromatographic retention times, but the temperature at which he ran his chromatography—a crucial determinant of retention time—has not been reported. He failed to indicate temperature in his November paper, which also contains no full spectra of authentic material (standards) or a literature citation where such a spectra can be found.

For the unspiked vegetation sample Mirocha reported 3.17 ppm T-2 toxin, 109 ppm nivalenol, and 59.1 ppm DON. On the spiked sample, he reported 35.7 ppm T-2 toxin—indicating a less than 10% recovery of T-2 toxin on that run—21.7 ppm of nivalenol, and no DON. Not only was the apparent recovery poor, but the ratio of nivalenol to deoxynivalenol changed. If the two halves are from the same leaf and stem, the absolute numbers could vary from one analysis to the next, but the ratio of one toxin to another would be expected to remain the same.

True, there is a problem of scatter in data—a problem that Mirocha may not consider because he doesn't report variance data in his November paper. And it is indisputable that each of the three toxins has a different solubility, as Sarver argues in defense of the reported data. Still, Mirocha analyzed two halves of the same leaf, using the same analytical technique, and got results very hard to explain.

The apparent poor recovery—less than 10%—could be a result of small sample size. Or, as Mirocha tells C&EN, it could be that the recovery was good but the spiking was not. Mirocha is correct in arguing that "the spiking could be as inaccurate as [the Army's] facility to spike allowed."

The second sample found positive for trichothecenes was 10 mL of water containing some never identified floating debris. This sample allegedly came from the same March 1981 Kampuchean attack site as did the leaf and twig sample, yet Mirocha only found 0.22 ppm or 66 ppm of DON, depending on whether the calculation is based on 10 mL of water or on the 33 mg of residue formed on evaporation. He found no T-2 nor nivalenol, which he found in the leaf sample. This is odd because nivalenol is even more water-soluble than DON and was found in far higher amounts than DON in the leaf and twig. Mirocha also reported finding DAS at 296 ppb in the water but not in the vegetation sample. So for whatever reasons, and Sarver says "distance [of the collected sample] from the main event is a determining factor," the vegetation and water samples from the same alleged chemical attack were found to contain very different combinations of toxins.

A rock scraping of yellow-green powder was the third sample found to contain toxins. This sample came from a March 23, 1981, aerial spraying attack in the Phu Big (northeast of the capital, Vientiane) region of Laos. Mirocha analyzed the sample on Oct. 20 or 23, 1981 (both dates are listed in his November paper), and found 143 ppm of T-2 toxin, 27 ppm of DAS, and a trace of another mycotoxin, zearalenone. Sarver's laboratory found pollen in the powder.

A year later, Sarver analyzed another portion of this powder, which had been found to contain the highest level of any trichothecene reported by the U.S.: 143 ppm of T-2 toxin. Sarver found none of the compounds previously identified by Mirocha.

Sarver and Mirocha both use GC-MS, but their extraction and cleanup procedures are different. Yet both find T-2 toxin in spiked samples. Says Sarver: "We do not miss the T-2 when it is present in those samples, nor does Mirocha. I think we can say the analytical techniques are similar." So why the difference?

"It came as no surprise to us," says Watson. The sample, sitting out the entire year in a capped vial at room temperature, "contained quite a bit of soil. . . . Soil microorganisms were present, and are certainly capable of breaking down the trichothecenes," Watson claims. Several chemists who regularly work with trichothecenes agree that some, but not total, degradation may occur in a year's time.

Complete degradation could occur if the sample picked up a lot of moisture, thus enabling the bugs to grow. "But growth like that would be obvious," says James R. Bamburg, a biochemist at Colorado State University. Unless there is excessive moisture, "it would surprise me that the trichothecene levels dropped to zero," Bamburg adds. Charles Thorpe, a supervisory chemist at the Food & Drug Administration, agrees. "I see no reason why T-2 shouldn't be present a year from now at almost the same level as today. Even if it is moist, I still would expect to find T-2 unless the sample was exposed to strongly acidic or basic conditions," Thorpe says. Watson and Sarver have never described the sample as moldy, or to have been exposed unintentionally to acid or base.

Sarver also argues that his zero finding may be explained by the powder's heterogeneity, or by variance. And he notes that his extraction procedure recovers only 10% of the trichothecenes when pollen is also part of the residue, which it was in this sample.

When asked about this startling discrepancy, Matthew S. Meselson, the leading critic of the government's case and a Harvard University biochemist who has counseled the White House, the departments of State and Defense, and the Arms Control & Disarmament Agency on biological and chemical warfare issues for the past 20 years, was nonplussed. He points out that T-2 toxin in that sample would have had "to go down by more than 1000-fold because Sarver's sensitivity is around 60 to 80 ppb and Mirocha had reported 143 ppm, or 143,000 ppb."

Sarver's failure to find toxins in this residue sample highlights a major problem with the Southeast Asian samples: None, according to Watson and Sarver, have been tested and confirmed to contain trichothecenes by two or more laboratories.

However, Watson says, the high T-2 toxin-containing residue sample analyzed by Mirocha may have come from the same attack as the ABC News sample analyzed by Rosen at Rutgers University. "It turns out they were collected the same week from the same village . . . and we think they came from the same attack series, maybe even the same attack," Watson says.

Rosen found T-2 toxin, DAS, and DON at about 50 ppm each. He found zearalenone at 265 ppm and some peaks suggesting the presence of the man-made compound polyethylene glycol (PEG). Watson claims Rosen's identification of T-2 toxin and DAS at about 50 ppm each "is well within the ball park for independent sampling at different times." However, Mirocha reported only a trace amount of zearalenone and no PEG.

Another characteristic common to both samples is pollen. Palynologist Joan W. Nowicke of the Smithsonian Institution and Meselson found pollen in a portion of the ABC News sample given to them by Rosen, and Sarver's laboratory found pollen in the sample Mirocha analyzed.

Rosen claims the ABC News sample is true yellow rain, and could have come only from a weapon because it contains mycotoxins, pollen, and PEG. He claims PEG or a derivative would be the logical dispersant for the weapons system. The presence of PEG "makes irrelevant any explanation for the natural occurrence of yellow rain," he asserts. However, no other laboratory has identified this man-made substance, and contamination of his sample before he received it, or even during his analysis, can't be ruled out.

Sarver has "not found evidence of PEG." And he hasn't looked for the material, even after Rosen's report, because he has "seen so many man-made compounds in these samples that it is unbelievable." He also implies that he can't eliminate the possibility that the source of the man-made material may be the containers in which the samples are collected and transported.

The ABC News sample may be the only non-U.S. government sample to be analyzed and found to contain trichothecenes. No other nation has come forward with data indicating the qualitative or quantitative detection of trichothecenes in yellow rain samples.

The fourth positive environmental sample was a tiny rock scraping from an alleged aerial spraying of a hamlet in Laos on April 2, 1981. The sample was so small, about 1 mg after methanol extraction, that Mirocha reported the presence of DAS at 10 ng per vial, or about 10 ppm.

The fifth and last positive sample was obtained from an aerial spraying of Thai villages near the Kampuchean border on Feb. 19, 1982. Hundreds of yellow-spotted leaves were collected and distributed widely.

Mirocha identified T-2 toxin at 0.086 ppm and DAS at 0.030 ppm—levels far lower than those detected in the other samples. According to University of Saskatchewan mycotoxicologist H. Bruno Schiefer, Thailand, France, Britain, Sweden, and Canada also found trichothecenes, mainly T-2 toxin and DAS, in the 40- to 100-ppb range, the same as Mirocha's findings. Unfortunately, this one instance of apparent replication can't be verified because only the U.S. has released hard data.

Canadian and Thai scientists also found pollen in the yellow spots. And the Thais also claim to have isolated a Fusarium fungus from their samples. But all of these findings may be irrelevant, says Schiefer. He believes this was not a true yellow rain attack, but a "Vietnamese diversionary tactic."

Ruse or not, the exercise has some value, Schiefer says. A Canadian epidemiologic study was able to correlate "very minute disturbances in the health of the occupants of houses sprayed" with the low levels of mycotoxins purportedly confirmed by several laboratories. The Canadian team unearthed no health complaints from occupants of houses not sprayed, Schiefer adds. There is one small hitch: The yellow powder was said to be sprayed from an aircraft flying at 5000 feet. The Canadians have yet to explain satisfactorily how material sprayed from that altitude can fall so precisely on a few selected houses but not on adjacent homes.

The only other positive nonbiomedical sample in the U.S. government's possession is the Afghan gas mask. The mask, believed to have been purchased by the U.S. in Kabul in September 1981, was analyzed by Mirocha, Sarver, and a third laboratory, possibly FDA. C&EN can't confirm that the mask was purchased, or the FDA analyzed it because the State and Defense departments have failed to answer these and many other questions put to them by C&EN. At any rate, each of the laboratories reported T-2 toxin on the outer surface of the mask, but not on the filters.

This single gas mask is the sum total of the government's physical evidence for toxin chemical warfare in Afghanistan. Another mask and some environmental samples have never been confirmed to be contaminated with toxins.

The five positive samples hardly prove a man-made origin for the mycotoxins found in Southeast Asia. And the U.S. hasn't analyzed and reported the results on enough control samples to prove that these mycotoxins are not part of the natural environment of that region.

Though Watson speaks of "all those controls," to date the U.S. has released information on only nine environmental samples: one water, two soil, one corn, one rice, and four leaves. These were collected from an area in Kampuchea said to be near Phnom Mak Hoeun, an alleged attack site. All tested toxin-free. But they were not collected in the same season as the toxin-positive samples.

No control material has been reported for the Phu Bia Mountain area of Laos, from where the majority of chronicled refugee accounts come. However, Sarver has said the U.S. has tested 16 controls. Some of these may be from Laos.

TWENTY TOXIN-POSITIVE BIOMEDICAL SAMPLES

According to Watson, fewer than 100 victims have been sampled to date. Blood and urine specimens have been collected from more than 60 people complaining of some of the symptoms the government associates with yellow rain. Of these, 20 have been found to contain T-2 toxin and/or its metabolite HT-2, usually in the low parts-per-billion range. Two of the 20 positives have been designated as tentative findings because Mirocha did not have enough material to run a full mass spectrum on them, a requirement for full confirmation. The significance of the other 18 positives also is in doubt. Positive samples often have been collected one to 10 weeks after an alleged attack, yet animal studies indicate that these toxins are almost entirely flushed from the body within 48 hours of exposure.

About 40 individuals who claimed to have been exposed to yellow rain have been tested and found to have no mycotoxins in their body fluids. "A negative from a person who is exposed has a lot of qualifiers around it," says Watson as an explanation for only one in three "victims" testing positive for toxins. Among these qualifiers, Watson says, are variability in rates of toxin metabolism by individuals, the distance the villager was from the site of attack, how much of a dose of toxin the villager received, and how long after an attack the sample was taken.

With the 20 toxin-positive, and 40 toxin-negative samples, Watson has accounted for about 60 of the 100-victim ball park figure she uses, which still leaves some 40 victims unaccounted for.

In addition to the samples from 100 victims, about 16 biomedical control samples have been collected, and have been found to be free of trichothecenes. If not insufficient in number (though this is difficult to know for certain because of the government's poor reporting practices), these blood and urine controls are inappropriate in character. Though apparently age- and sex-matched, the controls were healthy individuals, probably not eating the same diet as the so-called victims.

Writes Chancellor Lewis Thomas of Sloan Kettering Memorial Cancer Center: "We need to know whether trichothecene toxins are or are not present in the hospitalized people from the same area, malnourished and moribund but never exposed to yellow rain." Says Meselson, "The use of apparently healthy controls risks excluding trichothecene positives from the control group."

The U.S. government still rules out a natural origin for the mycotoxins found in body fluids, even though its biomedical protocol is apparently poorly designed and it has no positive environmental and biomedical samples from the same alleged attack. It makes the link to toxin warfare largely on circumstantial evidence. Says Watson: "The victims described a material that is sprayed by aircraft after which [a particular] set of symptoms begins."

However, there are problems with Watson's scenario. For instance, in some of the alleged events no mode of delivery is specified; the "victims" don't know where the yellow rain comes from, but they associate it with their illnesses. Then there are the animal studies, which indicate trichothecenes are eliminated rapidly from the body. And then there are the 40 individuals who claim to have been exposed to toxins, presumably became ill, yet have tested negative for toxins. And finally, there is the food eaten by the refugees, which may contain Fusarium mold, but which has not been tested extensively.

Although the U.S. cites autopsy evidence as the clincher in its solid case for the man-made origin of these toxins, the data from the only reported autopsy seem to support a natural origin. The victim, Chan Mann, a Kampuchean soldier, reportedly was exposed to a toxin attack on Feb. 13, 1982; a month later he was dead. Canadian medical officers who examined him say he died of blackwater fever, a form of malaria.

Both Mirocha and Rosen analyzed Mann's tissues for trichothecenes. Though Watson says Rosen's recoveries were better, only Mirocha's analysis has been released. He found the highest levels of toxin in the esophagus/stomach (4.02 ppm HT-2), kidney (2.55 ppm DAS), heart (1.2 ppm HT-2), and large intestine (88 ppb T-2 toxin and 9.6 ppb HT-2).

Timothy D. Phillips, a toxicologist at Texas A&M University, analyzed the same tissues for aflatoxin, a mycotoxin endemic to Southeast Asia. He found very high aflatoxin levels in stomach, liver, kidney, and intestine: "higher than one would expect to find in samples of human tissue," he says.

Meselson says the high levels of aflatoxin and trichothecenes in Chan Mann's gastrointestinal tract indicate "the ingestion of moldy food within the previous day or two." Such contamination of food is a distinct possibility in Southeast Asia, he says. T-2 toxin has been found to infest corn and sorghum in India, he points out. Phillips agrees that recent ingestion of, at least, aflatoxin is a possibility.

Watson, on the other hand, believes aflatoxin "was probably introduced via the diet; the trichothecenes, however, were certainly introduced via chemical exposure." She knows this because "trichothecenes are not endemic in that area, they do not contaminate food sources, they would not be expected to be found there, and have never been found there." Besides, she says, "He was exposed to a chemical attack in which he described symptomology that fits with the trichothecenes, and trichothecenes were found in the autopsy specimens."

A PARTICULAR SET OF SYMPTOMS

The major symptoms that the U.S. relates to trichothecene exposure—vomiting and diarrhea, sometimes with blood; skin rashes and lesions; dizziness; fatigue; tremors; and death—also are signs of diseases endemic to the area: respiratory (tuberculosis) and gastrointestinal (gastroenteritis) problems, fungal skin infections, malaria and hemorrhagic dengue fever, to name a few.

Donald B. Louria, chairman of the department of preventive medicine at the University of Medicine & Dentistry of New Jersey Medical School, spent a month at the Khao I Dang refugee camp in Thailand near the Kampuchean border. During that period he was presented the "best" yellow rain case collected by aid workers monitoring the issue for the U.S. "The prize case [of a yellow rain victim] they reported to me didn't sound like mycotoxicosis, it sounded like leukemia." Also, he says, "I didn't see anything there that gave me confidence that data were being collected that would answer the question [that yellow rain toxins are causing diseases]." Other volunteer physicians interviewed by C&EN have confirmed Louria's assessment of the U.S. collection effort.

Louria adds that with all the symptoms being reported for yellow rain exposure, "it is very difficult to establish a definition of a case." An official with access to classified information apparently agrees. The government can't separate the symptoms of mycotoxin exposure from "those due to other things in the mixture. There is no case in which only the mycotoxin has been dropped," he says.

In fact, the November 1982 State Department report (known as the Shultz report) says increased reporting of abdominal pain and prolonged illness with no bleeding suggests that "another agent or combination of agents is being used. The explanation is complicated because different symptoms are ascribed to men, women, children, and animals." Watson, however, insists there is a "particular set of symptoms that are associated with yellow rain attacks," and she furnishes a time course of symptom development to illustrate this.

Assuming that Watson is correct and trichothecene toxins are producing a "particular set of symptoms," the finding of T-2 toxin—and often not its metabolite HT-2—in human tissues weeks after an alleged exposure has to be explained.

Watson says humans may retain trichothecenes in an as yet to be identified depot. Trichothecene release may be biphasic, she explains, with an initial rapid excretion, followed by a delayed release. There are no documented data so support her thesis. Most animal studies indicate that the T-2 toxin, especially, is excreted from the body in 48 hours when the toxin is given orally, or by intravenous injection. Until recently there were few studies in which the toxins were introduced via inhalation, or through the skin.

William B. Buck, director of the Animal Poison Control Center at the University of Illinois, says ongoing studies in his laboratory indicate that for swine and cattle T-2 toxin's half-life in the blood is 15 minutes, and no toxin can be detected in the plasma after three hours, or in tissues after 12 hours. His group never detects T-2 toxin, or the more toxic DAS, in the blood or tissues after a single oral dose. Buck has not yet done inhalation, or continuous oral or dermal studies, but he thinks "it is unlikely that the toxins, especially the parent compounds, would be present in the blood two months after exposure."

The government's studies probing the question of toxin retention are ambiguous. David L. Bunne of the Army Medical Research Institute of Infectious Diseases, who has been tracking the metabolism of T-2 toxin, says metabolism is dependent on the route and dose administered. By intravenous injection, T-2 toxin in rodents has a "half-life measured in a few minutes, but then there is a second leg," he says. "If you expose an animal by skin, the final absorption is not complete even at the end of a month . . . the skin appears to be functioning as a reservoir . . . and there is a significant residual in both the liver and kidney," he explains. He has done few inhaltion studies, and has "no good data" for T-2 toxin by this route.

As Bunner himself points out, his metabolic studies are difficult to interpret. He uses labeled T-2 toxin and measures the label. "We still have to prove which [one] of the toxin structures" is being followed in the blood and organs. "We don't know if it is T-2, or which of its metabolites," he adds. He also doesn't know if he is merely tracing the labeled element.

The problem, says Meselson, is that "every time you look at any of the data, you find you have to spin out lots of very peculiar assumptions to preserve the State Department's point of view—like the half-life issue." The two-phase argument for the persistence of T-2 toxin is questionable, says Meselson.

He explains: "A significant problem with the argument is the volume of blood in a person. When T-2 is in the blood it has a 15-minute half-life. That means that T-2 has to be pouring constantly, at a tremendous rate, from this hypothetical depot. Since there is so much blood in your body, it must mean grams of the stuff inside of you."

THE PRICKLY PROBLEM OF POLLEN

Not only do animal studies suggest that the toxins found in the human tissues may be from recent ingestion of moldy food, but the pollen found in the environmental samples also may indicate a natural origin for these toxins. The extreme lengths to which the government has gone—and then retreated from—to explain the presence of pollen is yet another example of contorted reasoning in defense of its case that the toxins are manmade weapons.

The U.S. confirmed that pollen is a significant part of yellow rain samples in November 1982, after Thai scientists at Mahidol University, and Agriculture Canada mycologist Gordon Neish already had reported finding pollen in yellow rain. According to Alastair Hay, a chemist at the University of Leeds, "British scientists at the Chemical Defense Establishment at Porton Down" also found pollen in samples that year, as did Swedish defense scientists looking at specimens for the special UN team investigating toxin warfare allegations. And, of course, that year Australian Defense Department scientists found so much pollen and so little toxin that they declared their yellow rain samples "fakes."

The U.S. government at first accepted the presence of pollen in the samples as further proof of Soviet culpability. The theory then was that pollen, as a carrier for the mycotoxins, was an integral part of the weapon. At a November 1982 briefing, Gary Crocker, a State Department intelligence officer, said that "commercially collected pollen, pollen collected by insects, happens to be the right size to be retained in the body."

At the same briefing, Watson further clarified the role of pollen in the weapons system. As she explained the then-current theory: "The agent, as it comes down, is wet, and at this time the primary exposure appears to be through the skin. The toxins are dissolved in [a] solvent, going through the skin very quickly. But as the agent dries, the secondary aerosol effect can be caused by kicking up this pollenlike dust that is of a particular size that will be retained in the bronchi of the lungs. So there are two different ways the compound is absorbed." She went on to describe the toxin-pollen-solvent combination as a "very clever mixture."

This use of pollen as part of the weapon meshed with the Soviet Union's having a well-developed pollen industry, whereas Southeast Asia does not. And a U.S. official with access to classified information recently confided to C&EN that there is evidence of "an association of bee pollen collecting facilities near the confines of a chemical weapons facility in the Soviet Union."

The explanation for the presence of pollen in the toxic agent seemed to be supported by the research of University of Maryland chemist Bruce B. Jarvis. Working under an Army contract, he found bee pollen to be a good culture medium for the production of Fusarium spores. Under his laboratory conditions he had indications that a particular Fusarium strain was prodded into toxin production, possibly even trichothecenes.

Repeated reports of pollen, and especially the claims by Army and State Department officials that insect-gathered pollen is a "clever" vector for transmitting man-made mycotoxins, piqued Meselson's curiosity. At a meeting on yellow rain at Cambridge last spring, several pollen experts identified the plant families of some of the pollen. When Peter S. Ashton, the director of Harvard University's Arnold Arboretum, who was in attendance, heard the list he reportedly said, "The plant families are all common in Southeast Asia, and the pollen is gathered by bees."

As Meselson tells the story, Ashton then consulted a former Harvard fellow, Thomas D. Seeley. Seeley is a Southeast Asian bee expert who now teaches at Yale University. When Seeley heard that the yellow spots were a few millimeters in diameter, occurred over a small area at a density of several spots per square foot, changed in appearance from a sticky blotch that eventually dried to a powdery consistency, and continued to appear over a period of days, he told Ashton that the yellow spots sounded like feces of bees of the genus Apis, the true honeybee. This prompted Meselson and Ashton to collect bee feces around Harvard, and to photograph and examine the collected material.

In the meantime, palynologist Nowicke was examining the pollen of yellow rain collected by Canadians in Laos, and also a portion of the remains of the ABC News sample. Seeley also was examining samples of yellow rain, including the ABC News sample.

Based on descriptions of yellow rain, and their own examination of yellow rain and domestically collected bee fecal material, Meselson and Seeley, speaking for themselves, Nowicke, Ashton, and Julian P. Robinson, a chemical warfare expert from Sussex University, last summer told a gathering of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, "Whatever the source of mycotoxins in various samples, it is possible that yellow rain is bee excrement."

Photomicrographs of yellow rain and locally collected bee excrement were very similar in appearance, Meselson and colleagues said. Similar even down to the presence of bee hairs and high pollen count. A striking feature of all the spots examined was the variable diversity of pollen types from spot to spot.

Nowicke says that in the Laotian yellow rain samples she examined, including the ABC News residue, she was able to identify "pollen types consistent with plant families in Southeast Asia." In fact, she has found pollen types from two species of plants found only in Southeast Asia. She says all the spots and the ABC News residue examined contain a diversity of pollen, but the pollen composition of no two spots (or residue) is identical. "If the pollen were from an artificial source, I would expect the spots to be more uniform" in pollen composition, she says. Meselson argues that the lack of uniformity among the spots is a "characteristic of authentic bee shit."

Says bee expert Seeley: "I have no doubt that the yellow rain samples that people have turned in, and that I have seen, are bee feces. I say this because of their texture, size, and the fact that they were dense mixtures of pollen and other material." Sarver says the government contacted the "few people that know enough about bee feces to be an authority on it . . . and none of them are clear enough in their definition to indicate that by physical examination one can determine bee feces." He did not name these authorities.

Nowicke also believes that the material she has "been looking at is bee feces. But this doesn't deny the existence of yellow rain," she adds. It does, however, cast into doubt the government's claim that yellow rain samples turned over by refugees and others are evidence of toxin warfare.

"On the evidence that there is around, the bee theory is as good as any other theory," says Robinson. "The only reason we put it up was to encourage people to do more serious work on yellow rain, and to make them look ridiculous if they didn't."

It didn't work. The State Department immediately derided the theory as "the great bee caper." Mirocha termed it "ridiculous, and even absurd." Canada's Schiefer asked, "If yellow rain is bee feces, why is there heavy amounts of bee defecation only in militarily contested areas?" Watson denied the existence of pollen in all but one yellow rain sample.

Watson argues that only the highest T-2 toxin-containing yellow powder contains pollen. Sarver, however, amends that, saying that there are 11 or 12 powders from Southeast Asia with a "high content of pollen." More to the point, of the government's five positive environmental samples, some of which the Army says had no yellow spots, only two have been tested for pollen, and they were found to contain pollen.

If the universe is widened to include yellow rain samples from sources other than the U.S. government, then Meselson knows of 16 yellow rain samples that have been found to contain pollen. These include two UN specimens, five U.S. samples, one Thai specimen, two Canadian samples, the ABC News residue, one British sample, and four Australian samples, one of which was found to contain uric acid, an indication of bee fecal matter.

This plethora of pollen is not sufficient for Watson, and so she now backpedals: "That association between pollen and the attacks is not firm at this point," she insisted in November 1983. "That was never really a crucial issue . . . whether pollen is or is not involved is irrelevant."

Then Watson states as dogma that which should be the question: "What is involved is the fact that people are being killed with toxic agents. . . trichothecenes are a component of that agent, and that constitutes a treaty violation. What the carrier is is irrelevant."

It isn't irrelevant. If yellow rain is bee feces, it discredits the government's case. It places in doubt all the eyewitness reports. If refugees are wrong about the agent, may they not also be wrong about associating illness with Soviet-sponsored warfare? It also repudiates the government's star witness: the enigmatic Amos Townsend. Townsend, a physician working with the International Rescue Committee in Thailand, has been on the State Department's payroll for more than a year. His assignment: to collect evidence of yellow rain warfare.

Last August, after consulting "bee experts" in Thailand, Townsend sent the State Department a rebuttal to the bee feces theory. Seeley, who knows most of the bee experts in Thailand, was not familiar with any of the men whom Townsend consulted. And he was further puzzled because Pongthep Akratanakul was not queried. Seeley says that Akratanakul "is, to the best of my knowledge, the most knowledgeable person about honeybees in all of Thailand."

It is also puzzling and ironic that Watson has distributed Townsend's rebuttal to reporters. In it Townsend totally undermines Watson's present position by insisting that pollen is an integral ingredient of the toxic agent being used in Southeast Asia. He writes that a "Thai entomologist has said that there was 'too much pollen for bee feces' in the yellow rain spots"—too much pollen in yellow rain.

Townsend attaches much significance to white spots occurring "at the same time and place as the yellow spots and over the same area" in Kampuchea. He describes, but never identifies, these white spots, and he never explicitly connects them to alleged yellow rain attacks. They may be bird droppings or even the remnants of mold. Townsend also addresses spot density per unit area, which Seeley says needs more study. And he says the spot sizes he sees are too large to be bee feces. Seeley, however, says Townsend may be looking at more than one bee dropping. Finally, Townsend says the large area over which he finds spots is "unrealistic." To this, Seeley responds: "Townsend may not be looking at bee fecal matter."

Indeed, Townsend's rebuttal of the bee theory is so vague that even if his points are valid, they can't be interpreted as such by the reader. The inarticulate reasoning in the rebuttal supports the appraisal of Townsend by many physicians who have worked with him at the Nong Khai refugee camp in Thailand. They say that his interview techniques leave something to be desired and that he has not yet carried out the systematic investigation needed to help resolve the issue.

Sarver, who has done a systematic analysis of colleced samples, has been quoted as saying that "the evidence strongly supports" the involvement of bees. Further, he says the evidence does not exclude the possibility that yellow rain is bee feces, although he doubts this.

Meselson, with no such doubts, has tried to tie all the pieces of evidence together. First, he notes that all five of the government's positive invironmental samples, and 17 of the 18 firm positive biomedical samples, were collected from mid-February to mid-April, the tail end of the dry season in Laos and Kampuchea. This is a time of year when bees swarm in India, he says, and they also may swarm in Southeast Asia, although this is not known. This is also said to be the time of year when the hill tribesmen of Laos and Kampuchea, traditional rice eaters, turn to other food such as corn, which is a good substrate for Fusarium. Indeed, Meselson suspects, and there is some evidence for this, that this is also the time of year when Fusarium blooms—when the concentration of spores in the air reaches a high peak.

FITTING THE PIECES TOGETHER

Integrating all these pieces, Meselson speculates that at the same time people are eating moldy food and getting sick, the bees swarm and defecate. Because these two events are happening together, the people relate illness to yellow spots. Then on top of this float rumors of chemical warfare.

Some of these rumors may be traceable to 1964. Then, the Kampucheans accused the U.S. and South Vietnam at the UN Security Council of spraying lethal yellow powders on their villages and killing people. Less than a decade later, the U.S. sprayed the Hmong's poppy fields with herbicides. And Hmong reported deaths. So in both Kampuchea and Laos there is a collective history of aerial spraying and, perhaps, a basis for present-day rumors.

Meselson doesn't speculate about the nature of the spots on leaves and the yellow powders. "I have very high confidence that the yellow materials are bee feces not having anything to do with chemical warfare. I would assert with high confidence, but not as high as the first one, that the toxins found in environmental samples and in human tissues are of natural occurrence, not from military operations. The reason is the time delay between the finding of toxin and the alleged attack, and . . . that in that one autopsy the toxin was mostly in the stomach and intestine, and the man became ill just before he died."

Meselson's third proposition, to which he attaches no confidence level "because it is sheer speculation, is that we may be dealing with pellagra. I say this because of the symptoms and the seasonality." Pellagra is conventionally described in medical textbooks as a niacin-deficiency disease characterized by dermatitis, inflammation of the mucous membranes, diarrhea, and psychic disturbances. It occurs in the springtime and in some areas of India. But what is puzzling is that the people of these areas eat a lot of niacin-rich sorghum, which has been found recently to be tainted with T-2 toxin.

Louria, who treated Kampuchean refugees at Khao I Dang, says he "saw nothing in the refugee complaints to suggest pellagra." Though he said he did see "a lot of multiple vitamin deficiencies."

Meselson reaches these conclusions after an examination of the government's evidence. Controls for natural occurrence of the toxins in the environmental and biomedical samples are too few and not well matched. The finding of toxin in blood weeks after an attack is difficult to reconcile with the half-life evidence from animal studies, and the finding of the toxin at high levels in the autopsy material—in the first organs of entry for ingestion—indicates fairly recent consumption of moldy food.

Then, Meselson says, if you look at the modes of delivery reported by alleged victims whose blood contains toxin, you find an aircraft flying at above 5000 feet (too high for a spraying operation; crop dusters fly between 100 and 300 feet), a low-flying helicopter, artillery shells, a grenadé, and a land mine. Sometimes the victims allege exposure by walking through a field they were told was contaminated, sometimes no delivery mode is mentioned.

And still with all these reports, no munition has been retrieved that tests positive for toxins, Meselson says. The Pentagon's Dashiell says that's because the more recent attacks over Laos have involved aerial sprays of the toxins. Still, shells, grenades, rockets, and canisters have been reported to be the delivery systems for early attacks in Laos, and for attacks in Kampuchea to this day. The attack sites in Kampuchea are near the Thai border, so it is conceivable that weapons or their fragments can be carried into Thailand, just as environmental samples are. Also, it is apparent that none of the fragments and weapons examined show the design characteristics of chemical, as opposed to high explosive, weaponry.

And, Meselson says, there's the pollen. "It is incredible that anyone would use pollen. It's very, very outlandish. Then for it to be Southeast Asian pollen!"

It turns out that pollen can be nature's vector for transmitting mycotoxins. Leeds University biochemist Hay says that two pathologists in 1927, writing in the Philippine Journal of Science [32, 103 (1927)], knew that "disease-producing fungi could be carried on pollen grains from infected banana plants to healthy ones."

Further evidence that yellow rain may have a natural origin comes from a 1977 Chinese paper, which just surfaced. Written by four geologists at Nanking University and published in Science Bulletin (Kexue Tongbao, 22, 409, 1977), the paper describes the descent of yellow rain for periods of up to 20 minutes over areas as large as 20 acres in the province of Northern Jiangsu in 1976. The scientists report that the yellow drops fell as a viscous liquid that stuck to plant surfaces, forming up to 160 spots per square meter, with each spot a few millmeters in size, and then dried to a powder.

The spots were composed mainly of pollen from trees and plants of the area, but algae and other micro denzins of ponds where bees drink were also part of the spots. Because of spot size, the types of pollen grains found, and the proportion of grains with wall damage, the scientists conclude that the spots are probably fecal material released by bees on cleansing flights. No illnesses were reported.

The Chinese, it seems, weren't the first to comment on yellow rain. Charles Darwin reported the phenomenon in 1863. His observation is recorded in "The Collected Papers of Charles Darwin," Vol. II, edited by P. H. Barrett.

Buoyed by this scientific support, and by his and Norwicke's palynological analysis, Meselson says of Southeast Asian yellow rain: "If this stuff isn't bee feces, a most incredible and sophisticated effort has been applied by the Russians to make it look precisely like bee feces."

MILITARY UTILITY OF TOXINS

The larger issue is why the Soviet Union, or any country for that matter, would use trichothecene toxins as warfare agents. The U.S. argues that it is a very devious choice of weapon, so unusual that it took years to detect. Its use strikes terror in unsophisticated and unprotected hill people by killing some in a gruesome way and driving the rest permanently from their contaminated land. It is, says State Department intelligence officer Crocker, an effective weapon against "a dug-in resistance in remote areas." But, then, so are the less exotic harassing agents.

So why link trichothecenes to nefarious Soviet behavior? As a first cut, the U.S. argues that trichothecenes are indigenous to the Soviet Union. The Soviets have suffered several trichothecene-poisoning incidents. And the Soviets have done much scientific research on these toxins, and are even using them for pest control of their forests.

Initially the U.S. had argued that only the Soviets, not their Asian allies, had the technological skill and the military will to produce these toxins. After all, an accident at a facility in Sverdlovsk, under military control, may have been the cause of the still unexplained outbreak of anthrax in 1979 that the U.S. claims indicated treaty-violating work by the Soviets on biological weapons. Now, says the Pentagon's Dashiell, any country—including Laos and Vietnam—with a brewery can produce these toxins.

If this anecdotal evidence isn't convincing, the U.S. offers additional, albeit circumstantial, proof of Soviet involvement. There are eyewitness reports of toxic chemicals being unloaded in Southeast Asia. Defectors tell of Soviet chemical warfare experts supervising, and sometimes participating in, actual toxin attacks in Southeast Asia, and then returning to the attack sites to verify the effectiveness of the weapons. A U.S. official with access to intelligence data says he knows of one occasion when a "trichothecene or mycotoxin weapon was taken into Afghanistan and used." However, this occasion did not involve the gas mask contaminated with T-2 toxin, he says.

There are classified radio intercepts and photographs to document Soviet involvement in chemical and toxin warfare, the U.S. says. There are intelligence reports on Soviet toxin weapons development.

There is the fact that Soviet influence kept the UN team of experts from investigating yellow rain allegations firsthand in Laos, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan. And, of course, there are the two journalistic efforts frequently cited by government officials and their scientific allies as evidence of Soviet duplicity: The 1982 ABC News documentary "The Rain of Terror," and Sterling Seagrave's 1981 book "Yellow Rain."

If that were not enough support for Soviet involvement, there is also their doctrinaire acceptance of chemical weapons as an integral part of their force structure. And as the executive director of the Defense Science Board Paul J. Berenson says, "The Soviets have no moral compunction against using yellow rain."

They may have no moral compunctions, but they do have a strong desire to win wars, and trichothecene toxins appear to have little military utility. There are less exotic and equally effective terror weapons that violate no treaties. The riot gas CS, used by U.S. troops in Vietnam, not only can flush out dug-in insurgents but it can terrorize them in the process. If the raison d'être for toxin use is really the annihilation of the Hmong of Laos and other hill tribes, there are many more effective ways to do it.

The lethal dose of trichothecenes in animals (and maybe humans) is 2 mg per kg to 5 mg per kg, according to the National Academy of Sciences, which did a study for the Army on protection against trichothecene mycotoxins. For nerve gases, the lethal dose falls to 0.01 to 0.1 mg per kg. To deliver a lethal dose of toxins requires the release of about 1 g per square meter, or about 3 tons per square mile of pure toxin. If the mixture is a "crude" containing, say, only 10% toxin, 30 tons per square mile would have to be delivered. If the crude is never more concentrated than the highest level reported in yellow rain—about 100 ppm—then to kill by ingestion, a person would have to eat at least 200 g, and that is a conservative figure.

Says Saul Hormats, former director of the army's chemical weapons program, "3000 tons of light fluffy toxin-containing material would have to be sprayed over a one-square block target to kill most—and make the rest ill—of the people in the typical Hmong village."

Hormats' assessment of yellow rain: "The damned thing is ridiculous."

SCIENCE AT STATE

Ridiculous or not, the U.S.'s many scientific missteps and misstatements cast a glaring and not too flattering light on the way science has been used. "From that very first State Department communiqué that said that these fungi do not occur in Southeast Asia, and from the Secretary of State's speech in Berlin, based on one analysis. I knew for sure that the science advice the policy makers were getting was either poor, or they were ignoring it," says Meselson. With no resident science adviser at State, Meselson adds, "it is very risky for the department to be managing an essentially scientific enterprise."

The extent of that risk is becoming increasingly obvious. First, the department has known about the discrepancy between Mirocha's positive and Sarver's negative findings for more than a year. Instead of resolving the methodology problems, it continues to release Mirocha's findings as proof of Soviet-backed toxin warfare.

A second example highlights the lack of scientific understanding among the policy makers at State. In January 1982, the U.S. submitted a report to the UN on the analysis of blood collected from mine individuals, alleged victims of toxin warfare. In fact, blood was drawn from 13 Khmer Rouge soldiers, four of whom were controls, not exposed to chemicals. Two of nine blood samples from the exposed soldiers were found "tentatively" to contain HT-2. A white blood count also taken on all blood samples showed depressed cell counts in eight of the nine exposed soldiers, and in two of the four control soldiers. The U.S. says a depressed count is an indication of exposure to toxin.

The U.S. reports that "there was no real statistical difference between control and exposed groups when the Student's t-test was applied" to the white cell count analyses. Coupling the insignificance of the blood cell counts to the tentative finding of toxin in only two alleged victims, the U.S. concludes that the results "cannot be taken as conclusive scientific proof of toxin exposure [but] the latest analysis results contribute another piece of evidence . . . that trichothecenes have been used as chemical/biological agents in Southeast Asia."

The tentative finding of HT-2 in the blood so many weeks after an alleged attack also suggested a storage depot for the toxins, the U.S. says. Mirocha called his identification of HT-2 tentative because he did not have enough material to run a full mass spectrum. Without this information, compound identification can never be certain. Yet, in supposing a depot exists, the U.S. dismisses the possibility that Mirocha may not have been looking at HT-2.

More recently another example of scientific ineptitude slipped past the review of the policy makers. Last November, a U.S. representative to the UN General Assembly, Rep. Stephen J. Solarz (D.-N.Y.), sent a statement to that world body. In it he writes: "The combinations of trichothecenes in the yellow rain samples are unique. And, it should be remembered, trichothecenes are known to exist in nature only in temperate climates." This latter statement by Solarz to the UN comes after the government's star analyst Mirocha acknowledges the worldwide distribution of Fusaria, including some in tropical Central America that synthesize trichothecenes.

Has the State Department sought advice from the President's Office of Science & Technology Policy? No, says OSTP spokesman Bruce R. Abell, "not that I'm aware of." Has it asked the Defense Science Board to review the issue? No, says DSB director Berenson," the board has not been asked to review the yellow rain issue, though some members have been briefed on it."

So whom has the U.S. consulted? According to a knowledgeable government official who is closely monitoring the issue, some 150 to 200 fully cleared U.S. academicians have been briefed. "I haven't had one tell me that the judgment in the National Intelligence Estimate should be changed, that we didn't have sufficient documentation," this official says. C&EN has contacted a few of these scientists. Some say the U.S. has evidence that chemical warfare is being waged by the Soviets or their surrogates in Southeast Asia, although they are vague about the basis for their belief. Some, however, remain unconvinced by the evidence shown them.

More instructive, perhaps, is the low regard in which science is held at the State Department. When James F. Dobbins Jr., formerly director of Theatre Military Policy in the Haig State Department, and now a deputy assistant secretary of State for European affairs, was asked who advised Haig to go public with the unconfirmed analysis of the single leaf and stem, he said: "The judgment was made by our intelligence community, which includes many scientists—including Sharon Watson—that they had an adequate basis for the statement. Secretary Haig wasn't publishing a dissertation, and the litmus test, therefore, wasn't whether he cited enough authority to pass his dissertation and receive his doctorate." Would it have been wise to consult OSTP or DSB before Haig's statement? he was asked. "No. And it would have been highly irresponsible to do so, because people were getting killed every week."

Dobbins argues that the standards of scientific proof "are very different from the standards by which a policy maker decides whether or not something is true." But when the policy maker is using science, shouldn't he fall back on the standards of scientific proof? Dobbins was asked. "No," he says.

Michael Ledeen, a former special adviser to Haig who is now at Georgetown University's Center for Strategic & International Studies, evinces a disdain for science. "Frankly I am underwhelmed by the scientific community across the board. There is not a model that they have put out in the past 25 years that has stood up for a generation," he says.

Though the finding of toxins on the leaf tipped the scales, it apparently was the wealth of intelligence information that the U.S. had that prompted Haig's speech. Mirocha's analysis was merely the scientific sheen. Says Dobbins: "What this piece of information did was simply identify one of the many substances being used. This didn't tell us they were using chemical weapons. We knew that." That was known from "a whole body of intelligence evidence—contemporary, historical, direct, indirect, eyewitness, scientific—an enormous quantity of evidence," Ledeen says.

Intelligence analysis has indeed held sway over the issue, and those practicing it have been well rewarded. The Army's Sharon Watson, State's Gary Crocker, and CIA officer Kit Green have all received intelligence awards for their work on yellow rain. Unfortunately, it is these individuals, with a special interest in maintaining the integrity of the government's case, who have briefed—and may still be briefing—foreign conuntries, the UN team of experts, members of Congress, and influential U.S. scientists.

Despite the importance the Administration places on the intelligence data, it is the volume of refugee reports that most persuades those who have been briefed, and others who are convinced that the Soviets are conducting some type of biochemical warfare. Says the Army's Denny Lane, one of the early collectors of yellow rain stories, "There are some pretty stark tales being told out there."

GRIM TALES, PROBLEMATIC INTERPRETATIONS

It is difficult to dismiss hundreds of Hmong and Khmer accounts of thousands of gruesome deaths as a result of contact with the toxins. Tales of people dying as blood pours from every body orifice, of massive internal hemorrhages, of continuous bloody vomiting, of skin becoming soft, turning black, and peeling away upon touch, and of convulsions before the final gasp are just too grisly to be ignored. Nor should they be. The reports fueled the rumors that prompted the U.S. investigation of chemical warfare. They must be accounted for in any refutation of the charge of Soviet complicity in toxin chemical warfare.

But they must be accounted for by careful analysis. Are the stories plausible? Are there several reports describing the same alleged incident, and do they confirm each other in essential details? Is chemical warfare the only logical explanation for the illnesses and deaths reported?

After reading the U.S.-compiled accounts, all social scientists and Southeast Asian experts contacted by C&EN say the answer to these questions is no. Further, they stress, the report have to be read with an understanding of the cultural and social structure of those telling the stories and, more important, why they are telling them.

To begin, the majority of the 150 to 200 reports of yellow rain compiled by the State Department in two compendia come from the Hmong of Laos. (Statements such as Rep. Solarz's in the U.S. November 1983 submission to the U.N. of refugee reports "several thousand in number" are not supported by U.S.-released evidence.) All yellow rain reports come not from the more isolated Ban Nam Yao refugee camp in Thailand but from the highly politicized Ban Vinai refugee camp to the southeast.

The leadership of Ban Vinai is composed of former members of the old CIA-backed secret army in Laos. And the more military-oriented stories come from these former U.S. allies, not from Hmong male farmers, and not from Hmong women, say author of the "Yellow Rainmakers" Grant Evans, a sociologist at La Trobe University, Melbourne, Australia, and Roger Rumpf and Jacqui Chagnon, researchers with the Southeast Asia Resource Center, New York.

In this book, Evans argues that the interviews have been unevenly, not systematically, collected by personnel untrained in the art of ferreting out information without leading the refugees. Columbia University Anthropologist Christina Szanton, a Thai specialist, agrees. "The investigators are often medical teams who transgress basic rules of reliable sociological analysis. The questionnaires used by the 1979 Army Surgeon General's medical team and by the 1982 Canadian epidemiologic investigation led by Col. Gary Humphreys contain leading questions."

Both social scientists claim the reports since 1979 have been collected in the full belief that chemical warfare is happening. Says Szanton, "The only task is then to investigate what kind of chemical agent is in use." And they argue that because the camp leadership sets up all interviews there is a preselection of both respondents—only refugees with chemical warfare stories—and of acceptable translators.

In fact, Evans describes one Hmong refugee, Ger Pao Pha, as a "star witness" whom he had interviewed as had 13 other journalists and organizations, including the UN investigating team. Ger's story varies substantially over time, and from interview to interview.

For example, Ger has changed the mode of delivery from a rocket that released a lethal red smoke/gas that killed within 15 minutes to a low-flying plane that "sprayed smoke." He has told a U.S. investigating team that about 230 people in his village died from the summer 1978 attack. Two years later he told one journalist that 13 people had died, and another that 40 had succumbed. Sometimes he has come to an interview with a son, his only surviving relative; sometimes that relative has been his daughter.

In some of his accounts, Ger has saved himself and his son by merely running away to hide in a cave; sometimes his story has him putting "a rag soaked with opium" over their faces and running to a cave. At times, from the cave, he has seen Pathet Lao coming to his village to remove the few who are still alive; at other times, Vietnamese have entered the cave chewing the corners of their shirt collars to protect themselves from the ill effects of the chemicals.

Ger's stories cannot be cross-checked against any others released by the U.S. And his accounts vary so much over time, Evans says, that Ger's yellow rain tales can't be accepted on their own merit. Further, Evans says that when he let Ger relate his experiences in his own words, he discovered that Ger's village had indeed suffered a heavy loss of lives in a number of serious conventional battles in which no smoke or gas had been used.

The U.N. investigating team under Maj. Gen. Esmat A. Ezz, a University of Chicago-educated toxicologist who is director of scientific research for the Egyptian armed forces, had similar difficulties in cross-checking information. Refugee stories told the UN team differed markedly from those told Ban Vinai physicians. In one case the team was told that an attack made one victim ill for 20 days; the physicians were told that the same attack had made the victim ill for 20 minutes. In another instance, an alleged victim told the team that a yellow rain attack had killed a woman; the physicians had been told by this victim that 80 people had died.

DISCREPANCIES IN THE STORIES

Rumpf and Chagnon, a husband-and-wife Lao-speaking team, report discrepancies in yellow rain stories related by a Hmong couple interviewed separately. The Hmong wife said she and her husband had left Laos because he was a CIA Hmong soldier who feared arrest and imprisonment by the leftist Lao government. According to the wife, they had lived in Nam Po village from 1976 to 1982. And she had seen yellow rain on leaves after which some people got ill, but nobody died. She did not associate yellow rain with aircraft or military activity.

Her husband, on the other hand, said he took his family to Phu Bia in 1978 and that they lived there for three years. He saw "a lot of yellow rain" in Phu Bia, and if "people were hit with the chemicals they would die," he said. He said low-flying Soviet planes delivered the chemicals. He also had a rash on his hands which he attributed to the chemicals, but which a camp physician was treating as ringworm.

Conclude Rumpf and Chagnon: The wife's story "resembles accounts we heard inside Laos while her husband's corresponds to Ban Vinai refugee stories."

The lack of cross-checking and cross-referencing is a major problem with the refugee accounts, Szanton says. "There is a lack of internal checks on the information—in a sense, control samples on a social basis," she says. This, in part, could be done by checking refugee accounts with information collected by other means. "There is no attempt to cross-check refugee stories to reconstruct events based on more than one statement, and no attempt to check the internal consistency of answers provided by each respondent over subsequent interviews," she explains. Rumpf and Chagnon cite another glaring defect in the use of the refugee accounts: the "failure to cross-check refugee 'gassing' stories with on-site observations inside Laos."

In fact, Rumpf and Chagnon say that in stories they heard inside Laos, in areas alleged by the U.S. to have been under chemical attack, a yellow substance was associated with sickness and sometimes death, especially among children and the elderly. But one major difference between Lao-collected accounts and those they heard inside Thai refugee camps is that "inside Laos we do not hear the source of the substance coming from an airplane. What we heard is that they don't know where it is coming from," says Chagnon. "And there is no fighting, no warfare going on in the area when they see it. So it is not associated with military maneuvers or resistance groups," adds Rumpf.

They also found no evidence of a campaign to eliminate the Hmong, which is an allegation made by Mirocha in an editorial published in the Journal of Toxicology-Toxin Reviews [1,199 (1982)], and which is alluded to most recently by the U.S. in its Nov. 4, 1983, statement to the U.N.

"From our discussion with Hmong in Laos, and from reports of U.N. and other international agencies, there is no evidence that there has been a campaign of genocide against the Hmong, whether former CIA Hmong or Hmong is general. We met former CIA Hmong in many parts of Laos who are farmers and merchants today, who are living in villages with other Hmong, and who are integrated into the government structure, but not at high levels," Rumpf says. Chagnon points out that "there are Hmong who are military and civilian (police) leaders of Xieng Khousang (Plain of Jars) Province. It is here where the U.S. claims these attacks are going on."

Adds anthropologist Robert Cooper, who has worked among the Hmong in Thailand and in Laos, "I think if there was any question of a holocaust, then there wouldn't be a single UN person left in Laos. Obviously the U.N. could not support a country which was exterminating 10% of its people." More important, in nearly three years in Laos, Cooper has never heard villagers describe a yellow rain attack. During this period, 1980-83, he worked in areas identified by the State Department as having been under attack.

Cooper is struck by the similarity of the U.S. compendia stories, but he doesn't know what to make of this. "Logically one would say, 'Well if they are all telling the same story there must be something in it.' Or, one could say, 'If they're all telling the same story, surely that's a bit suspicious and there is nothing in it.'"

His own personal feeling, purely conjecture and based, he says, on "irrational logic," not on the refugee reports or on his work with the Hmong, "is that there was probably something at some time—and it could have been military—but it has been greatly exaggerated." There was warfare, he says. "It seems logical that if there was some gas available it would have been used. But I certainly don't know the nature of what has been used, or how much has been used," he explains.

Chagnon and Rumpf speculate that during the last-gasp resistance of CIA Hmong on Phu Bia Mountain between 1975 and 1979, the Pathet Lao and their Vietnamese partons "may have used some kind of CS tear gas." They would have used CS to flush out the resistance fighters from the forest and cave shelters. However, they have no evidence that tear gas was used, merely that there was fierce fighting and the Pathet Lao did crush the Hmong resistance in the type of battle in which CS would be most useful.

Sociologist Evans believes that yellow rain is a metaphor for disruption, that it offers the Hmong a reason for illness, death, crop failures. And when combined with their horrid wartime experiences it becomes fodder for panic rumors perpetuated by the Hmong leadership.

Certainly the Hmong's troubles have made them a more unified people, Cooper says. "But I'm not very convinced by Evans' idea of a great panic spreading through the people. The Hmong are just too intelligent for that." Other anthropologists, especially the French, agree with Cooper. Says Boston College anthropologist Jeanne Guillemin: "People I know who worked in the area are very resentful about Evans' portrayal of the Hmong as susceptible to superstition and irrationality. That's not the nature of those people; they are very pragmatic."

Still, the Hmong have been subjected to U.S. aerial herbicide sprayings, and they could have made these part of their mythology, linking aircraft overflights and a yellow substance to illness and death many years later. Around 1973-74, the CIA did spray Hmong poppy fields with agent orange and related herbicides. Even then, W. E. Garret wrote in a 1974 issue of National Geographic [145,78 (1974)], the Hmong reported deaths from these aerial spraying. Chagnon and Rumpf say the Hmong and Lao they interviewed in 1982 describe these decade-old sprayings as "yellow poisons," or "yellow rain."

Equally puzzling is that Montagnards, the highland people of Vietnam who fought with the U.S., have described ills and deaths very similar to yellow rain symptoms and deaths now being reported by the Hmong. The Montagnards, however, were not exposed to trichothecene toxins, but to defoliants used by the U.S. during the Vietnam War. Equally intriguing is that the Montagnards and the Hmong are genetically and culturally dissimilar.

There is another conundrum. The major battles to rout the Hmong resistance from Phu Bia occurred during 1977 and 1978. In addition, 1978 and 1979 were two bad crop years. The crush of Hmong fleeing Laos for Thailand occurred in 1979-80: The reasons appear to be economic as well as political. Yet most of the yellow rain stories from the Hmong came after 1979, and they continue to be told to this day, the U.S. says. If it is not a natural occurrence, and if there are no major battles, how can this be?

The answer, says Guillemin, may never be known: "It might be an episode that's really over." Pathologist Richard C. Harruff, who treated refugees at Ban Vinai and who believes that he isolated a few patients whose lung problems best correlated with chemical-toxin exposure, agrees. He is "rather skeptical that a study mounted today could produce the kind of proof that would convince everybody; there would have been a better chance to do that in 1980" when many more refugees were crossing the Mekong River into Thailand.

Harruff is talking about an epidemiological study. But it may also be too late for interviews. A patented yellow rain story appears established among the Hmong in Thai camps, says Marshall G. Hurlich, a University of Washington anthropologist.

In addition to the problems with the packet of U.S. interviews cited earlier, Guillemin adds a few more. The U.S. "didn't take into account the cultural differences between the person asking the questions and the person responding. It proceeded with these interviews on a case-by-case basis, exactly as a physician would, and completely ignored the facts that there are strong clan ties, separate men's and women's groups, and a totally different perception of the human body and the causes of illness," Guillemin explains.

SPIRITS, SOULS, SICKNESS

"There is a Grand Canyon of cultural difference between the way in which the Hmong think of and understand the causality of illness, and the way we do," Guillemin says. And, she adds: "I think those U.S. interviews involving patients must have been a travesty."

The Hmong practice an animist religion in which conscious life is ascribed to inanimate objects. Disease and well-being are controlled by spirits. Death comes when one of several souls leaves the body and doesn't return. Within this belief system, Hmong, unlike Western physicians, can explain what has come to be called sudden death syndrome (SDS), says Hurlich.

Over the past several years, there has been a rash of sudden, seemingly unexplained nighttime deaths among young, mainly male, Southeast Asian immigrants, most of whom have been Hmong. When epideminologists from the Centers for Disease Control, who were investigating these deaths, asked Homong if deaths like this occurred in Laos, they were told no. Explains Hurlich, "The category of unexplained deaths doesn't exist for the Hmong in Laos. There, all deaths can be explained by a loss of soul, or a failure to take care of ancestral spirits. The CDC's question was based on a misunderstanding."

Perhaps. CDC, however, seems to have made up for this lapse by doing a first-cut epidemiological study of the problem. Despite a suggestion by Columbia University pathologist Bernard M. Wagner that sudden death among Southeast Asians may be related to exposure to yellow rain, CDC medical epidemiologist Roy C. Baron says there "is no association between persons who died and any known or possible exposure to what is known as yellow rain. The vast majority of victims left before any record or suspicion of use of these agents."

CDC has studied about 80 sudden deaths, 79 in males, in seemingly healthy individuals from Laos, Kampuchea, and Vietnam, and has reported on the design and findings of the epidemiologic study in the Journal of the American Medical Association [250, 2947 (1983)]. Pathologists in Chicago are studying serial sections of hearts, and finding indications that SDS "may be a congenital abnormality in the electrical system of the heart," Baron says. As Hurlich points out, however, the latter study has yet to compare hearts from SDS victims to those from Hmong who have died from other causes. In other words, there are no controls.

Hurlich's graduate student Ronald G. Munger has found sudden, unexplained deaths among Hmong in the Thai camps. More important, he has unearthed clusters of these deaths in familial lines, suggesting, Hurlich says, "a possible biological or genetic basis." Such a genetic predisposition may be prevalent in most Asian populations. Munger writes that "Hmong sudden deaths show a striking similarity to a sudden death syndrome called bangungut in Filipino males [and] sudden nighttime deaths have been noted among Japanese living in Japan, Japanese and Chinese living in Hawaii, Montagnard tribesmen who moved from the highlands to the lowlands of Vietnam, and among ethnic Lao, Mien [Yao], and Cambodians living in the U.S."

"The clues are pointing to a physiologic basis for SDS," Hurlich says. But the causes may be many: cardiac problems plus sleep abnormalities, with the triggering factors being stress or trauma. Deaths reportedly occur during sleep and after individuals make a grunting or moaning sound. Most have been among recent arrivals, or those coping poorly with a vastly different life style.

That some biologically susceptible refugees are now falling prey to cultural shock can't be overlooked. In its interviewing procedure, however, the U.S. did miss a crucial aspect of the refugees' situation. The U.S. "didn't appreciate the vulnerability of the people being interviewed, that they were refugees who did not want to spend their life in a camp in Thailand. Of course, they are going to be accommodating. Who wouldn't?" Guillemin asks.

And that brings one to motives. The Hmong with a yellow rain story find their entry into Thailand eased. And once they have emigrated to the U.S., chemical warfare, they seem to feel, preserves their status as political refugees who have been persecuted as opposed to immigrants who have left their country because of economic pressures.

"The whole notion that there really was and, maybe, still are attacks of chemical warfare is very important to the Hmong leadership in this country," Guillemin says. This leadership argues that they have been politically persecuted, that they were allies of the U.S., and because of that were shot at, gassed, and driven from Laos. "The chemical warfare argument has become part of the proof that they really are legitimate political refugees. But I think they don't need chemical warfare to show that. In fact, they have paid a very high price for being allies of the U.S.," Guillemin says.

Altruistically, the U.S. feels it is repaying its former allies by keeping the issue of toxin warfare before the public's eye. And officials leak hints that the campaign has paid off. Says State's Dobbins: "It is my impression, based on old information, that as a result of the publicity campaign, the Soviets and their allies have essentially abandoned the use of this substance."

Other government officials, who ask not to be named, say the U.S. received no reports of toxin attacks from Afghanistan and only a few reports from Southeast Asia in 1983; no collected samples tested positive for toxins. State's Leonard says the U.S. will release a major update shortly detailing its findings.

NO SUPPORT FROM OTHER NATIONS

The Canadians, who have submitted to the UN several reports on alleged chemical warfare in Southeast Asia which the U.S. claims supports its case, are also about to release yet another report. Gordon Neish, a mycologist at Agriculture Canada, says, "To the best of my knowledge, material collected by Canadians and analyzed for trichothecenes were found not to contain toxins at significant or undisputable levels."

In other words, the finding of toxins was not incontrovertible. Officially the Canadian government will not comment until after its report is released. However, Schiefer, the author of the first Canadian report whose conclusions often are quoted by the U.S., says Canada has one toxin-positive sample. That one comes from the odd event in Thailand in February 1982, which he doesn't consider a true yellow rain attack, but a Vietnamese attempt to confuse the issue.

Canada has said that chemical/biological warfare is being conducted in Southeast Asia. This conclusion is based on refugee interviews, an epidemiology study, and Schiefer's two-week visit to Thailand—not on physical evidence.

Schiefer's report reaches six conclusions, four of which are cited by the U.S., most recently in its November 1983 statement to the U.N. Because of this, it is worth close scrutiny.

Schiefer spent 16 days in Thailand in February 1982. During that period he interviewed victims and refugees; received reports from scientists, physicians, and Thai authorities; investigated the general disease pattern in Thailand with special emphasis on ills related to mycotoxins; and gave two lectures at universities.

From this whirlwind effort he concludes, and the U.S. cites:

"The events that are reported to take place at the time of alleged chemical warfare attacks cannot be explained on the basis of naturally occurring diseases.

"Judging on the basis of eyewitness reports, it appears that three different types of agents have been employed as warfare agents, one of them being 'Yellow Rain.'

"Most of the features described with 'Yellow Rain' attacks are consistent with trichothecene mycotoxicosis."

The fourth point, the U.S. paraphrases: "Although certain types of mycotoxins occur in Thailand and probably also in surrounding countries, there is no history of evidence that they result in diseases with the symptomatology of trichothecene poisoning." Not quoted by the U.S. is Schiefer's conclusion that the symptoms described by victims correlate better with a disease caused by macrocyclic trichothecenes, not the simple trichothecenes identified by Mirocha.

Schiefer admits that he did only "a limited amount of work," and that his conclusions have "to be taken with some care. I think that is a fair assessment of my work, and I don't object to it." He did collect yellow rain samples, which contained Fusaria. Two species—semitectum and moniliforme—are capable of producing trichothecenes. He, however, has not been able to coax toxin production in the laboratory, but he admits that that doesn't rule out the possibility that they do produce mycotoxin in Southeast Asia.

Apart from the Canadian reports, and a limp statement by French Foreign Minister Claude Cheysson last year, no other nation has come forward to support the U.S. charge of Soviet-backed toxin warfare. Speaking to the press in Bangkok, Cheysson said, "France has discovered 'multiple and convergent' signs of the use of toxic chemicals in Afghanistan and Southeast Asia by the U.S.S.R. and its allies." Then he added that France did not have "irrefutable evidence." Apparently that translates to physical evidence because France has yet to release analytical data.

In fact, no other nation has yet gone public with analytical data supporting the U.S. finding of trichothecenes in samples collected from a yellow rain attack site in Southeast Asia.

Earlier, Australian chemist Hugh D. Crone, with the Department of Defense Materials Research Laboratories, analyzing yellow rain samples collected from a Thai attack found toxin levels so low, and the presence of pollen so prevalent, that he said the samples were "obviously fakes." Now he is rethinking his position in light of the bee feces theory, and has even tested a yellow rain sample for uric acid, the bee's mode of eliminating nitrogen wastes. Uric acid was present in that sample, possibly indicating bee feces. The Army's Sarver says this test is not specific enough—birds also excrete uric acid wastes—and he is "developing a more specific test for bee products."

Officially, Australia says there is evidence for Laotian and Vietnamese chemical warfare, but not for the identity of the active agent or agents being used.

The British hint that they have no evidence of toxin warfare. Chemist Tomas D. Inch with the Chemical Defense Establishment at Porton Downs says his government is reluctant to say anything until it has the "analytical evidence in the way we would like it" on samples with "a good history to them." He explains that the analytical technique, GC-MS, is so sensitive that "without careful control of all variables you can either get false positives or false negatives quite easily." The eyewitness accounts have impressed Inch, but his chemical training keeps him from being certain about the identity of any particular chemical involved.

The UN team investigating allegations of chemical warfare in Southeast Asia was equally uncertain about whether the active agent was indeed trichothecene toxin. After two years of careful analysis of various reports, plus briefings by the U.S., but no on-site investigation in Laos or Kampuchea, the team, headed by Egyptian Maj. Gen. Ezz, concluded that it could not prove U.S. allegations, nor could it "disregard the circumstantial evidence [of] possible use of some sort of toxic chemical substance in some instances."

Ezz and his team of scientists from Kenya, the Philippines, and Peru also were troubled because they could never be certain that alleged yellow rain samples and alleged victims actually came from an area under chemical attack. The team, says Ezz, also was plagued by the lack of "freedom of choice of laboratories with experience in the detection of trichothecenes." Of the three laboratories that analyzed samples for toxins, two, using thin-layer chromatography, failed to find trichothecenes in any samples, even the spiked controls. The third laboratory, using GC-MS, found the four yellow rain trichothecenes in all samples, including the blank.

These results could indicate that testing for toxins is a prickly business, as one government official asserts. On the other hand, several nations tested samples from that odd 1982 Thai attack, and each purportedly found toxins in the same parts-per-billion range. If true, this shows that confirmatory testing can be done.

Ezz admits that his team collected only circumstantial evidence. What is needed, he says, "Is physical evidence that will go unchallenged."

INDEPENDENT EFFORTS

To go unchallenged, means, in part, that the investigation be carried out by an independent group of experts. The Lao government has assured Samuel S. Epstein, a toxicologist at the University of Illinois Medical Center, and Egbert W. Pfeiffer, a zoologist at the University of Montana, as well as a distinguished foreign diplomat, among others, that it will allow a team inside Laos to investigate chemical warfare allegations. Team members, however, cannot be U.S. government- or UN-affiliated scientists. Such an investigation is very welcome, says anthropologist Cooper, because "so much is being said based on so little knowledge."

Chagnon and Rumpf agree. Based on the assurances that Epstein and Pfeiffer received from the Lao government, Chagnon and Rumpf are now planning an effort that, at the very least, will begin to fill in the gaps about what is natural in terms of fungi and their toxins, and diseases for that part of the world. Their scientific team, cosmopolitan in composition, is to be headed by Cryrus Levinthal, chairman of the department of biology at Columbia University. Among its members will be a physician experienced in tropical diseases, an anthropologist familiar with good interviewing techniques, a bee specialist, a chemical-biological warfare expert, and a microbiologist/mycologist.

Levinthal says there are really two issues that his team will try to make a dint in resolving: "whether or not mycotoxins have been used in warfare, and whether or not the population is being contaminated with mycotoxins through natural sources." He is not saying the government's case can be disproven, only that it is "irresponsible to claim with such assurance . . . that chemical agents are being used before [the government] has solid evidence that this is so."

To accomplish this, the team will travel to Laos and Thailand for three weeks in early 1984. It will interview Hmong in Laos and in the Thai refugee camps. In Laos, it will visit alleged chemical warfare sites as well as Hmong and Lao villages where no reports of battles have emerged. From these sites, it will collect physical and biological specimens. The team also will glean information from Laotian health officials, and from officials from the UN and other international organizations in Laos and Thailand. Only two things are missing at this point: final permission from Lao government and funds to underwrite the project.

Another person trying to collect funds for an independent epidemiologic study in Southeast Asia is Stuart J. D. Schwartzstein, director of the yellow rain project at the Institute for Foreign Policy Analysis, Tufts University. Schwartzstein has "no doubt that chemical weapons are being used. I think the refugee reports themselves are very strong." But he would like to organize an epidemiological team that would go "to one of the camps and take a closer look at the people there." He has a science advisory board consisting of some eminent scientists, but he has no funds to conduct his study.

Schwartzstein admits that "there are a number of questions, and a number of unresolved problems—both with the data that have been accumulated as well as the mechanisms of investigation." Still, he doesn't "think that invalidates the basic conclusion that chemical weapons, including toxin weapons, have been used."

The Army's Lane, an early collector of yellow rain stories, is not so certain about the solidity of the government's case. He is puzzled by the many "unanswered questions in this exercise." And he thinks these have to be answered by physical and biological, not social, scientists. "We can go out to interview until the cows come home," he says, "but that isn't going to be terribly conclusive, is it?"

ONE GIGANTIC LEAP

It apparently was conclusive enough for the U.S. to accuse the Soviets of treaty violation. Says a government official, "The intelligence community made its mind up on information not publicly available. The gestalt of what I'm saying is that you would make a mistake [if you think] the subject can be addressed in the public domain." But if not in the public domain, where?

Evans says that if the same standard of evidence demanded of Vietnam veterans seeking compensation for alleged dioxin-induced ills had been demanded of U.S. officials "putting forth allegations about yellow rain, then the yellow rain allegations would never have [gotten] off the ground." The evidence, Cooper adds, "all seems to be hearsay, it all seems to be nonprovable, and it all seems to be evidence that can be read either way."

So why did the U.S. seemingly leap from minimal facts to adamant accusation? Sociologist Evans says it's a cold-war story, used by the President, his Cabinet, and some members of Congress as an example of how the Soviets can't be trusted to hold to treaty agreements. But Meselson points out that "arms control is very important, and verification is essential for arms control. The making of allegations and verification are two sides of the same process." And, he argues, "You can't have high standards in verification and low standards in making accusations."

Anthropologist Guillemin thinks the Defense Department, especially the Army, used the issue to garner votes for binary chemical arms. Yellow rain did move votes, she adds, "it just didn't move them enough" to overturn the 14-year hiatus of chemical weapons production.

Others have called yellow rain, the 1980s' "Gulf of Tonkin" incident. This is an allusion to an event that was reported to have occurred, really didn't, but served as the prod that escalated U.S. involvement in the Vietnam War.

These skeptics are justified in seeking ulterior motives. The U.S. simply has not proved that toxin warfare has taken or is taking place in Southeast Asia or in Afghanistan. A soon-to-be-released U.S. report, rather than dispelling uncertainties, is likely to cast the government's case into greater shadows of doubt.

And potshots aimed at the bee theory won't make the government's pollen problems go away. The theory, ultimately, may be proved wrong in part or in whole, and it certainly will never explain why trichothecene toxins are found in blood and urine. But it further tangles the web in which the U.S. has ensnarled itself, and from which it cannot easily extricate itself. The presence of pollen has to be explained.

Every sample that has been turned into the government as yellow rain and has been examined for pollen has been found to contain pollen. If it does nothing else, the presence of pollen undermines the government's strongest evidence—the refugee reports. If refugees are turning in material of natural origin, might they also be mistaken in linking their illnesses and deaths to aircraft-delivered yellow rain?

The government may have unearthed, quite by accident, a very serious health problem in Southeast Asia. Calling it toxin warfare, or bee faces, or anything else obscures a more pressing humanitarian problem. Says anthropologist Hurlich, the Hmong medical problems, of whatever origin, are being lost sight of, and "the Hmong again end up being used for the political ends of other people. That repeats their historic relationship with the U.S."

The U.S. simply has to concede that it has badly botched the science needed to prove its case for toxin warfare, and that it has to start over. If the U.S. doesn't 'fee up, it is no better off than Lyndon Johnson's hitchhiker. In the spring of 1965, after being told that the South Vietnamese government was on the verge of collapse, Johnson reportedly said: "I feel like a hitchhiker caught in a hailstorm on a Texas highway, I can't run, I can't hide, and I can't make it stop."

TRICHOTHECENES: MYCOTOXINS PRODUCED BY FUSARIUM FUNGI

Trichothecenes, the toxins claimed to be the putative agents of yellow rain warfare, are the biologically active metabolites of several species of fungi. One species, Fusarium, produces the specific toxins—T-2 toxin, diacetoxyscirpenol (DAS), nivalenol, and deoxynivalenol (DON or vomitoxin)—identified in yellow rain samples.

WIDE DISTRIBUTION

Fusaria and their toxin products are widely distributed throughout the world in habitats as diverse as "deserts, tidal salt flats, alpine mountain regions and the tropics," a National Academy of Sciences report on defenses against trichothecenes recently affirmed. However, for most regions of the world, there is little precise knowledge of the Fusaria present and capable of producing toxins.

In 1939 a French mycologist Francis Bugnicourt documented the presence throughout Southeast Asia of many species of Fusarium, including some which, under some conditions, produced the yellow rain toxins. Whether these Indochina Fusaria actually synthesize trichothecenes has not been well studied. Toxin production is dependent on specific environmental and nutrient conditions, and whether those in Indochina support toxin biosynthesis is not known.

The chemistry and the toxicology of the trichothecenes have been somewhat better studied than their distribution. There are more than 40 different trichothecene compounds; all have a basic tetracyclic sesquiterpene structure. The skeletal structure bears a six-membered oxygen-containing ring, an olefinic bond at the 9-10 position, and an epoxide group at the 12-13 position. Toxicity is conferred by the epoxide group and its destruction neutralizes the molecule.

In general, trichothecenes are colorless, crystalline, and optically active compounds. In the solid state, they are very stable. Microorganisms will degrade the toxins, but the time course of such detoxification depends on physical conditions such as pH and moisture.

Of the four yellow rain toxins, DON is the least toxic, and the one most often detected in agricultural commodities. In animals, T-2 toxin is a strong skin irritant, nivalenol and DAS are potent hemorrhagic agents, and DON causes vomiting.

All four yellow toxins have been found in grains, usually at concentrations ranging up to 10 ppm. But levels as high as 40 ppm have been recorded for DON in barley and corn in Japan and the U.S.

The average concentration of a deliberate release of trichothecenes, NAS says, "could be more than two orders of magnitude greater than typcial levels produced by natural sources." The trichothecene levels detected by the U.S. government in the majority of Southest Asian environmental samples are not even an order of magnitude greater than typical natural infestation levels.

RECOGNIZED HEALTH HAZARD

Because Fusaria infest cereal grains, trichothecenes have long been recognized as a human health hazard, especially in Japan and the Soviet Union. Anecdotal reports of foodborne illness account for much of what is known about the effects of trichothecenes in humans.

But frequently in these accounts, the active toxins are not known. Except for DAS, which has been tested and rejected as an anticancer agent, there is little precise knowledge of the effects of specific trichothecenes in humans.

Tested as an antitumor drug, DAS depressed bone marrow activity (blood and platelet production), and produced nausea and vomiting in a majority of patients. Less frequent signs of toxicity were hypotension, skin irritation, diarrhea, central nervous system disturbances, fever and chills, and death in a few cases. DAS did not stem tumor growth. Many of the symptoms reported in DAS-treated patients are similar to those reported by persons allegedly exposed to yellow rain attacks.

Soviet scientists have described a four-stage disease called alimentary toxic aleukia in which trichothecenes, especially T-2 toxin, have been implicated. In the first stage, which occurs within hours of eating moldy grain and which may last for several days, the victim feels a burning sensation in the mouth, esophagus, and stomach. Soon the victim may experience vomiting, diarrhea, weakness, fever, and sleep disturbances.

If recovery does not occur, the patient enters the second stage during which a marked decrease in white blood cells, granulocytes, and lymphocytes occurs. In the third phase, a petechial rash develops on the skin and spreads over the body, and necrotic lesions in the mouth may cause death by strangulation in the most severe cases. In the fourth or recovery stage, the patient is subject to secondary infections. Convalescence is long, lasting up to several months.

Because livestock often are exposed to infested feed, a lot of animal toxicological studies have been carried out. But in these, the routes of exposure have been parenteral or oral. There are no published studies in which animals have been subjected to dermal or aerosol exposures. For the existing studies, data indicate that of the simple trichothecenes, DAS, T-2 toxin, and nivalenol are the most toxic. But, in general, another group of trichothecenes called macrocyclics are more toxic than their simple brethren.

SYSTEMIC EFFECTS

Once in the systemic circulation, trichothecenes affect a variety of organs and tissues. The most susceptible of these are the mucous membranes of the digestive tract, the skin, and the blood-forming tissues. In some animals, the immunological system is affected; in others hemorrhages have been produced in the digestive system, liver, kidney, and heart.

Metabolic studies in animals are inconclusive: Pathways and routes of elimination of the trichothecenes have not been worked out. All published animal studies, however, indicate that the trichothecenes are cleared rapidly from the body. This differs significantly from the government's reporting of T-2 toxin and its metabolite, HT-2, in blood and urine samples tested months after an alleged exposure to the mycotoxins.

MIROCHA: QUOTES FROM THE GOVERNMENT'S ANALYST

"Chemical and/or biological warfare has been waged in Laos, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan resulting in the death of 75-100,000 human beings," J. Toxicol.-Toxin Reviews, 1, 199 (1982).

"The results of both hearings on yellow rain, one by the Senate and the other by the House Foreign Relations Committee leave no doubt in my mind that the Hmong people of Southeast Asia were the victims of chemical attacks." J. Toxicol.-Toxin Reviews, 1, 199 (1982).

"Among the poisons used were the trichothecenes. . . . We have unequivocal proof of their identity and quantiation." J. Toxicol.-Toxin Reviews, 1, 199 (1982).

"The finding of T-2 toxin, diacetoxyscirpenol, deoxynivalenol, zearalenone, and Fusarium pigment in leaves, water, yellow powder, and fragments originating at sites of yellow rain attacks in Southeast Asia and their absence in background samples (leaves, corn, rice, water, soil) from areas not exposed to yellow rain strongly implicates their use as warfare agents. Moreover, the finding of T-2 toxin and HT-2 toxin (a metabolite of T-2 toxin in animals) in the blood, urine, and tissue of some victims of these attacks provides unequivocal proof of their use as weapons." J. Assoc. Off. Anal. Chem., 66, 1485 (1983).

"I think I have a responsibilty to say these things, particularly because of the rhetoric and lack of constraints that people like Matt Meselson [Harvard University biochemistry professor and proponent of a natural origin for yellow rain] and others have displayed. I do not see why I should not come to a logical conclusion based on my experience and data. I don't see anything immoral or unethical in what I have done. I think from the standpoint of morality, I have an obligation to report and interpret what I see." 11/7/83 interview with C&EN.

"I would consider myself less of a person if I did not have the courage to go out and interpret that which I find."

ALLEGED SOVIET USE OF TOXINS VIOLATES TWO TREATIES

According to U.S. interpretation, the purported use of toxins by the Soviets in Southeast Asia and Afghanistan violates two arms control agreements. The first is the 1925 Geneva Protocol, which outlaws the use, but not the possession, of chemical and bacteriological weapons. The second is the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention, which bans even the possession of biological and toxin weapons.

The 1925 protocol, which the U.S. ratified in 1975, is one of the oldest treaties extant. The Soviet Union and Vietnam also are among the more than 100 nations who are parties to the agreement. All signatories are obliged never to use asphyxiating, poisonous, or other gases, and bacteriological agents as weapons of war. However, Laos, Kampuchea, and Afghanistan are not parties to the treaty. So technically, the U.S.S.R. does not violate the agreement if it uses these weapons in Afghanistan, since a violation occurs only if both parties in a conflict are signatories to the treaty.

However, over the years, a standard of conduct of war without lethal chemical arms has evolved among most nations, whether bound by the Geneva Protocol or not. This de facto ban on the use of such weapons now is generally accepted as part of customary international law, binding in spirit and practice, if not by treaty.

Afghanistan, Kampuchea, Laos, the Soviet Union, the U.S., and Vietnam are all bound to the provisions of the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention. Beyond very small research quantities, this agreement outlaws the production of biological, bacteriological, and toxin agents for warfare. Such agents and their associated weaponry and delivery systems also cannot be developed, produced, stored, transferred, acquired, or retained.●

J. EDGAR HOOVER

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, Mr. Hal Vogelsang, who is a good friend of mine, is a retired FBI agent who resides in Butte, Mont. I recently received a letter from Mr. Vogelsang in which he expressed his resentment at the television portrayal of J. Edgar Hoover in the television program "Kennedy," which aired November 1983.

I believe Mr. Vogelsang has raised a number of legitimate criticisms of the television portrayal, which are based upon his personal experiences with Mr. Hoover and with the FBI. I would like to share Mr. Vogelsang's views with my colleagues at this time by including his letter in the record.

The letter follows:

Hon. MAX BAUCUS,
U.S. Senator, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MAX: NBC-TV has presented a miniseries entitled "Kennedy" which you may have viewed. It appeared to be a recitation of the Kennedy Presidency. However, a major portion of the program was devoted to an anti-J. Edgar Hoover theme.

As you are aware, I am a retired FBI Agent whose career spanned 1941-1977. Among other things, it was noticed that when the TV presentation centered on Mr. Hoover, he was constantly referring to his subordinates and employees as "boy," in a most demeaning manner.

During my years as a Bureau employee, at no time did I ever have any knowledge of Mr. Hoover addressing employees in such a derogatory tone. Nor have any of my fellow Agents, over the years, ever mentioned this as being a trait of Mr. Hoover. The entire show made Mr. Hoover out to be almost a maniac.

After the finish of the telecast, a young lady in Butte informed my wife, Carol, that she was only 5 years old at the time of President Kennedy's death and recalled little concerning the era. But after seeing the program, "she had no idea J. Edgar Hoover was so evil." This is the thought the program presented. Why the writers, producers and directors of such a program would use this vehicle to vent their spite on Mr. Hoover is beyond comprehension.

Mr. Hoover is not here to defend himself. My wife and I consider the portrayal of Mr. Hoover and the FBI in this program to be an insult and an affront to all the people who have served in the FBI and it is deeply resented.

I would hope you might enter in the Congressional Record a protest to the misconception this telecast presented to the American public in an effort to correct the injustice brought about by NBC television and "Kennedy."

Sincerely,

HAL VOGELSANG.●

CONGRESSIONAL WIVES FOR SOVIET JEWRY

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, this week the Congressional Wives for Soviet Jewry is hosting an international conference in Washington, D.C. With over 50 wives of Members of the U.S. Congress, as well as wives from members of the Canadian, British, Israeli, and Netherland Governments, the CWSJ has become a forceful and active participant in the international effort to call attention to the plight of Soviet Jewry and to support efforts to free the thousands of victims of Soviet oppression.

It is testament to this great democracy we call America that these women will assemble in our Nation's Capital to meet with top administration officials such as Robert McFarlane, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, and Elliott Abrams, Assistant Secretary for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, and to hear Elie Wiesel, himself a Holocaust survivor and one of the most eloquent voices in opposition to persecution, discrimination, and oppression wherever it exists in the world. No such opportunities exist in the Soviet Union.

Anatoly Shcharansky, Iosif Begun, Viktor Brailovsky, Ida Nudel, these are just a few of the literally hundreds of names that have become symbols of the movement to put pressure on the Soviet Government so that these innocent victims can achieve a long-held dream of joining their family and friends in the United States or Israel. Our efforts toward this important goal must not cease.

Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to extent my sincere appreciation to the congressional wives for their work on behalf of Soviet Jewry, and to the National Conference on Soviet Jewry for their efforts. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter I received from Elena Fridman, the sister of Ida Nudel, who is now living in Israel and eagerly awaiting her sister's release from the Soviet Union. I would also like to place in the RECORD a New York Times article about the congressional wives conference this week.

The letters follow:

REHOVOT, ISRAEL, February 28, 1984.

Hon. H. JOHN HEINZ,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C., U.S.A.

DEAR SENATOR HEINZ: I continue to appreciate the depth of your concern for the fate of my sister, Ida Nudel, and your efforts to bring about the reunification of our small family.

I write to you at this time in anticipation of the upcoming international conference of the Congressional Wives for Soviet Jewry scheduled to take place in Washington D.C. at the beginning of April, knowing that many of Ida's and my friends will participate and hoping you will share this report with those participants with whom you have contact.

Having legally completed her sentence of four years of internal exile in Siberia in March 1982, followed by a frightening six-month period of homelessness during which she was denied municipal residence permits in numerous places, including her own apartment in Moscow, she was finally allowed residence in the small Moldavian town of Bendery. Yet this has proved to be another form of exile.

It was the thousands of letters she had received in Siberia which had helped sustain her spirit. Since arriving in Bendery, she has received almost no mail. Many people have written to me saying that their letters have been returned with a note from the Soviet postal authorities indicating "Inconnu: No Such Address." I have seen some of the envelopes and know they have been correctly addressed.

For the past year she has worked as an attendant at the local Bendery amusement park. Her heart condition has flared up on occasion, but she has not left the town for medical treatment, as she had previously been told that her entry into Moscow was forbidden.

During the past two months, I have become increasingly alarmed by certain new developments. The Soviet authorities seem to be intent on precipitating yet another confrontation with Ida by outrageous provocations.

This began on January 5 of this year when she was summoned by the local deputy police chief who warned her that she was being watched "by the people whose job it is to do so" and that she was not to have any more visits to her home by the "people who call themselves 'refuseniks'." She was also warned not to leave Bendery. Non-compliance would mean arrest, the official said. The timing of this warning was clearly a result of Ida's celebration of the Jewish holiday of Chanuka with some friends who joined her three weeks earlier.

On January 24, 1984, she was summoned by Mr. Arlen Mikhailovitch Shebanow, Deputy Chairman of the Bendery Supervisory Commission on Laws on Religion, who stated that he knew that on the Jewish religious holiday of Chanuka people got together in her home. He suggested to her that she register herself according to the by-laws pertaining to religious groups in Moldavia. According to law (he proceeded to quote the following):

"Passed as an Order by Presidium Supreme Soviet of Moldavia SSR, Number 1616—IX—19/V 1977

"Paragraph 8: An organization or group of people who believe may begin their activities only after a decision as been taken based on registration by the Committee dealing With Religious Matters of the Supreme SSSR Committee of Ministers."

Ida bravely replied that matters of religious belief are not a proper subject for discussion between a government official and a private citizen. The official indicated that not applying for this registration would be a clear violation of this law if she plans to again have people in her home to celebrate such holidays.

Senator Heinz, I have come to know you as a friend of Ida's as someone concerned with her fate. I am alarmed by this latest development. The Soviet authorities are obviously bent on making the advent of every holiday in the Jewish calendar a period of fear for Ida, for me and for all those dedicated people the world over who treasure the principles which guide her.

After twelve years of refusals, as she approaches her 53th birthday on April 27, the time has certainly come for the Soviet authorities to relent and allow her to join me in Israel. I know that with your continued help, we can accomplish this seemingly modest but inexplicably difficult goal.

Sincerely yours,

ELENA FRIDMAN.

CONGRESSIONAL WIVES TAKE ON DELICATE ISSUE

(By Barbara Gamarekian)

WASHINGTON, April 1.—For more than five years, a group of Congressional wives has quietly pursued a cause. The women write letters, make speeches, hold silent vigils in front of the Soviet Embassy and meet with dissidents in Moscow and Russian émigrés in Washington.

The group, Congressional Wives for Soviet Jewry, is one of the many organizations in the capital with a cause. In this case, the women have banded together to support the cause of human rights in the Soviet Union.

Congressional Wives for Soviet Jewry is sponsoring a three-day conference that starts today. Some 20 wives of Members of Parliament from Canada, England, Israel and the Netherlands will join wives of American lawmakers in meetings with officials, including President Reagan's national security adviser, Robert C. McFarlane, and the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights, Elliot Abrams. On Tuesday night, Elie Wiesel, the noted writer on the Holocaust, will speak at a dinner in the Senate Caucus Room.

NO MEETING WITH AMBASSADOR

A request to meet with the Soviet Ambassador here has gone unanswered, according to Dolores Beilenson, co-chairman of the group. And a request that the women meet with Nancy Reagan, Mrs. Beilenson said, "could not be worked out."

Mrs. Beilenson is the wife of Representative Anthony C. Beilenson, Democrat of California. The other cochairmen of the group are Joanne Kemp, wife of Representative Jack Kemp, Republican of Buffalo; Teresa Heinz, wife of Senator John Heinz, Republican of Pennsylvania, and Shirley Metzenbaum, wife of Senator Howard M. Metzenbaum, Democrat of Ohio.

The group was founded in 1978 by Mrs. Kemp and Helen Jackson, wife of Senator Henry M. Jackson, the Washington Democrat who died last year, after several Congressional wives had met with Avital Shcharansky, wife of the imprisoned Jewish dissident Anatoly B. Shcharansky.

The 45 members of the group include women whose husbands represent all shades of the political spectrum.

"We are basically a watchdog group," said Mrs. Kemp, adding that the members petitioned the Soviet Embassy on "prisoners of conscience" and met on an ad hoc basis for briefings from experts on the Soviet Union and for talks with Soviet Jews who have emigrated. She said she was in touch with the families of Soviet dissidents whom she met in Moscow last summer.

Mrs. Beilenson said: "When a case comes up, like the recent Iosif Begun trial, we were able to get information to a number of Congressional people. Some of us write letters, give talks, some try to stimulate activity back in our districts."

The number of Jewish emigrants from the Soviet Union has recently slowed to a trickle, with 1,315 emigrating in 1983, according to Catherine Cosman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe. She estimated that 200,000 to 400,000 Jews want to emigrate from the Soviet Union.

Mr. Heinz, whose own family was uprooted from Mozambique, says she thinks most Americans "don't understand persecution."

"They have never seen tanks coming through, people killed," she said. "My experience is very different from Soviet Jews, but I know about expatriation and loss and having no recourse. You just pack up and go. I have seen it happen to my family and friends."●

SOVIET TREATY VIOLATIONS

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I want to commend my colleagues Senators McCLURE and KASTEN, for requesting a session of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee to review the issue of Soviet arms control treaty violations and their implications for U.S. security. This is a critically important subject, and one that must receive our continued attention in the wake of the President's report on Soviet noncompliance. The President has taken a major step forward in an effort to restore integrity to the arms control process; yet it is only a first step.

We must assess the security and arms control implications of Soviet actions, and design an integrated program to negate any advantage the Soviets might hope to secure through their noncompliance with treaty commitments. To this end, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the prepared statement of Mr. Richard Perle, Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Policy, who testified before the subcommittee. Mr. Perle continues to be one of the most forceful and articulate spokesmen for responsible arms control policy, particularly with respect to verification matters. His counsel on the subject of Soviet arms control treaty violations is, therefore, deserving of our careful consideration. I ask that Assistant Secretary Perle's statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

TESTIMONY OF THE HONORABLE RICHARD PERLE, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE (INTERNATIONAL SECURITY POLICY)

Despite the unhappy nature of my report to you this morning, it is a pleasure to appear before the Senate Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations. I have been asked to speak today about Soviet violations of important arms control agreements. As President Reagan told the United Nations Special Session on Disarmament in June 1982, "Agreements genuinely reinforce peace only when they are kept. Otherwise we are building a paper castle that will be blown away by the winds of war."

After a year long intensive study of Soviet compliance with existing arms control agreements, President Reagan forwarded a report on Soviet compliance to the Congress on 23 January 1984. He summarized the findings of the report as follows:

The United States Government has determined that the Soviet Union is violating the Geneva Protocol on Chemical Weapons, the Biological Weapons Convention, the Helsinki Final Act, and two provisions of SALT II: telemetry encryption and a rule concerning ICBM modernization. In addition, we have determined that the Soviet Union has almost certainly violated the ABM Treaty, probably violated the SALT II limit on new types, probably violated the SS-16 deployment prohibition of SALT II, and is likely to have violated the nuclear testing yield limit of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty.

These are serious issues. Our concerns are deepened by the fact that Soviet violations in a number of cases involved treaties the terms of which are not very demanding—SALT II would allow an enormous increase in Soviet nuclear capability. Indeed, there has been almost a 75 percent increase in Soviet nuclear warheads aimed at the United States since SALT II was signed in 1979. The fact that the Soviet Union has gone even beyond this and violated important treaty provisions is a cause for serious concern.

Another cause for concern is the fact, as Secretary Weinberger has observed in his recent report to the Congress, that: "Several of these violations must have been planned by Soviet authorities many years ago, in some cases perhaps at the very time the Soviet Union entered into the agreements."

There are serious potential security risks from Soviet arms control violations. This is particularly true in the ABM area. Since the ABM treaty does not limit the production of ABM intercepter missiles, which can be deployed rather quickly, the radar limitations are its core provision because large radars take years to construct. The ABM Treaty is hardly an optimum arms control agreement. Many of its provisions are permissive and thus involve a calculated risk. Even in 1972 the Soviet radar base was already more extensive than that of the then proposed U.S. Safeguard ABM. Indeed, a unilateral statement the U.S. government issued during the SALT I negotiations noted that, "Since Hen House [Soviet ballistic missile early warning radars] can detect and track ballistic missile warheads at great distances, they have a significant ABM potential." The new Soviet large phased-array radars (LPARs), now being deployed in significant numbers, are far more capable than the Hen House.

The United States has long been concerned about the ABM potential of Soviet large phased-array radars. Indeed as early as 1970, then Secretary of Defense Melvin R. Laird told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, "You all know that with regard to ABM defenses, long-lead items are the acquisition and tracking radars." Soon after signing the ABM treaty the Soviets began the construction of a new generation of large phased-array radars far more capable than the Hen House to support a large ABM program. Indeed, during the Carter Administration, the JCS reported that: "Soviet phased-array radars, which may be designed to improve impact prediction and target handling for ABM battle management, are under construction at various locations throughout the USSR. These radars could perform some battle management functions as well as provide redundant ballistic missile early warning coverage."

In mid-1983 the United States discovered the construction of one of these radars deep in the interior of the USSR near the city of Krasnoyarsk. After a minute analysis study of this radar, its capabilities and Soviet explanations for its construction, the United States Government has concluded that: "The new radar under construction at Krasnoyarsk almost certainly constitutes a violation of the legal obligation under the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972, in that in its associated siting, orientation, and capability, it is prohibited by the Treaty."

We have other serious concerns about Soviet failure to comply with the ABM Treaty. During the negotiation of the Treaty, the U.S. Government attempted to deal with the threat of the upgrade of Soviet bomber defense (SAM) missiles into ABM systems. We were particularly concerned about the SA-5. In the testimony cited above, Secretary Laird voiced concern about the ABM potential of the Soviet SA-5 noting that, "We cannot rule out the possibility that the Soviets have given or will give this system, called the SA-5 or Tallinn system, an ABM role. We believe it is technically feasible for this system. This is a problem of particular concern because of the extent of the Tallinn deployment—over 1,000 intercepter missile launchers." The United States settled for a prohibition of testing such SAMs in the ABM mode but without a specific definition of what this meant.

Over the years we have expressed concerns to the Soviet Union about Soviet testing of bomber defense missile (Surface-to-Air Missiles or SAMs) radars against strategic ballistic missiles. A 1978 report of the Carter Administration stated that this activity ". . . could have been part of an effort to upgrade the SA-5 system for an ABM role or to collect data for use in developing ABM systems or a new dual SAM/ABM system." Moreover, the Soviets have developed a rapidly deployable ABM system. In addition, as the Scowcroft Commission noted in its report, "At least one new Soviet defensive system is designed to have capability against short-range ballistic missiles; it could perhaps be upgraded for use against re-entry vehicles of some submarine-launched ballistic missiles and even ICBMs." Two of the new Soviet SAMs now being deployed, the SA-10 and the SA-12, could have ABM potential if provided data from large phased-array radars.

Concerning the SALT II Treaty we have determined that there have been a number of violations or probable violations. We believe that the Soviets have probably deployed the SS-16 ICBM in violation of a specific treaty prohibition. The Soviets have either flight-tested a second new type of ICBM in violation of a treaty provision or they have made impermissible modifications to an existing type. We believe that the Soviet SS-X-25 probably is a second new type in violation of the Treaty limit of one new type.

The limit of one new type of ICBM was described by the Carter Administration as one of the principal limits of SALT II. To quote Secretary of State Cyrus Vance in 1979, "Based on their past practices they could be expected to acquire several entirely new types of land-based missiles by 1985; the treaty limits them to one." While the "new" type limit of SALT II was hardly as restrictive as the Carter Administration made it out to be, the one thing the Carter Administration did insist on was that the SALT II Treaty would prohibit their testing of both a new medium and a new small solid fuel ICBM. They have now done both. They have flight-tested a new medium solid fueled ICBM similar to our MX and the SS-X-25, a Minuteman sized solid fuel missile.

The United States has determined that Soviet encryption of missile telemetry impedes our verification of SALT II in violation of the agreement. This is a serious development because it also affects our ability to negotiate a verifiable START Treaty. Indeed, President Carter told a Joint Session of the Congress in June 1979 that: "A violation of this part of the treaty—which we would quickly detect—would be just as serious as a violation of the limits on strategic weapons themselves." The Senate Foreign Relations Committee was so concerned about telemetry encryption in 1979 that it adopted an understanding to the resolution of ratification, sponsored by Senator Biden and adopted by a 15 to 0 vote, which provided:

That any practice with regard to the transmission of telemetric information during the testing of strategic arms limited by the Treaty, including but not limited to the failure to transmit relevant telemetric information, which results in impeding of verification by United States national technical means of any provision of the treaty, will be raised by the United States in the Standing Consultative Commission and if the issue is not resolved to the satisfaction of the United States, the United States reserves the right to exercise all other available remedies, including, but not limited to, the right to withdraw from the treaty.

Soviet violations of the chemical and biological treaties are more than simple arms control violations. They are artrocities. These weapons have been used against defenseless human beings in an organized effort to drive them from their homes by killing thousands of them. The decline in the use of these weapons reported in today's newspapers does little for the thousands who have died and nothing to absolve the Soviets from eight years of cruel and inhumane attacks with lethal mycotoxins.

The Soviet violation of the Helsinki Final Act involved an action contrary to the confidence-building measures included in that agreement.

Soviet testing of nuclear weapons, which we believe is likely to have exceeded the 150 kiloton limit of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty, could result in the development of improved warheads for their strategic weapons systems.

Violations, however, are more significant than the immediate military consequences of the acts themselves. They raise questions about the integrity of the arms control process that may be far more significant than the short-term military impact. Despite much rhetoric in the 1970s about the terrible consequences to the Soviet Union of arms control treaty violations, it is clear that these treaties are extremely difficult to enforce. There are those who even now demand standards of proof that simply cannot be met by national technical means of verification. There are those who argue we should ignore violations because they are not militarily significant. Others suggest that these Soviet violations are somehow our fault—we have not been tough enough with them in the SCC. Some even suggest we should sweep these issues under the rug because they spoil the climate for future arms control.

There has been some criticism of our decision to make public these Soviet violations. Some of this echoes the criticism of the Arms Control Association without repeating its most fundamental injunction: "Violations of arms control agreements cannot be overlooked or excused." Perhaps the tone of the Arms Control Association press conference would have been different if it had accepted the Administration's offer of a classified briefing on the report before it held its press conference. It chose to hold its press conference before such a briefing could be arranged and even before the final report was finished and presented to the Congress.

The most fundamental misconception fostered by the Arms Control Association is that somehow Soviet arms control violations are our fault because until recently we have not raised SALT II issues in the Standing Consultative Commission (SCC). This is simply not true. We began raising SALT II issues in the Spring 1981 session of the SCC. We have also raised them through senior diplomatic channels. We called for a Special Session of the SCC in 1983 which the Soviets refused to attend.

The fact of the matter is that the SCC has been largely unsuccessful over the years in resolving compliance concerns. Unfortunately, previous administrations have exaggerated its effectiveness in order to sell unverifiable arms control agreements to the U.S. Congress. Ambassador Paul Nitze was correct in 1979 when, during the SALT II hearings, he testified that: "They [compliance concerns] were resolved by accepting what has been done in violation." One can debate whether the issues of the 1970's were violations or circumventions or a mix of both. There is no doubt that the Soviets have proven remarkably adroit at exploiting ambiguities in arms control agreements to proceed with activities that it was the intent of one of the parties—us—to preclude by treaty. In doing this, the Soviets have not hesitated to mislead us, deliberately and all too successfully, in order to achieve their purpose. While we regard the spirit of agreements as a guide to their implementation, the Soviets do not. They care nothing for the spirit of agreement and, while it suits their purpose, little more for their letter. This is a sad commentary; the truth is not always happy.

The charges we have made against the Soviet Union are the result of an extremely intensive study of Soviet compliance that lasted over one year. We carefully reviewed the evidence and the negotiating record. These charges shold not be confused with the Soviet propaganda contained in the Aide Memoire released by the Soviet Government. The Soviets know full well that we are in full compliance with our arms control obligations.

There is nothing new about arms control treaty violations or attempts to deny the existence of these violations or their significance. Sir Winston Churchill waged a very lonely campaign against these tendencies in the 1930's. In 1933 he first warned of Hitler's violations of the arms control provisions of the Treaty of Versailles. His revelations were treated with disbelief. The Labour party had just won an important by-election on an overtly pacifist platform. In 1933 Sir Winston noted that these pacifist leaders ". . . represented that Germany might have a few thousand more rifles than was allowed under the Treaty, a few more Boy Scouts" but then "pictured the enormous armies of Czechoslovakia and Poland and France with their thousands of cannons, and so forth. If I could believe that picture I should feel much more comforted, but I cannot. The great, dominant fact is that Germany has already begun to rearm." Mr. Churchill's warnings were ignored.

In 1934 Sir Winston Churchill challenged the British Government concerning German compliance with arms control provisions of the Treaty of Versailles. In the House of Commons he stated that—

". . . the worst crime is not to tell the truth to the public, and I think we must ask the Government to assure us that Germany has observed and is observing her treaty obligations in respect to military aviation." Unfortunately, the British Government did assure the British people, contrary to the facts, that Hitler was not violating the Treaty of Versailles.

Even as late as 1935 the British Government was ignoring Hitler's arms control violations, even refusing to admit that the Germans were violating the limits on warship construction. Sir Winston railed in the House of Commons, ". . . even the battleships are laid down. I do not know how the Admiralty came to be without information that even battleships, contrary to the Treaty, were being laid down. I am astounded at such a thing. We always believed before the [First World] War that battleships could never be laid down without our knowledge. The Germans were entitled to build 10,000-ton ships according to the Treaty, but they, by a concealment which the Admiralty were utterly unable to penetrate, converted these into 26,000-ton ships. Let us be careful when we see all these extremely awkward incidents occurring."

The British Government was not careful. It continued to deny Hitler's arms control violations. Thus, England slept until it was too late to avoid the second World War.

This Administration is dedicated to the negotiation of effective, meaningful and verifiable agreements for arms reduction. This cannot be accomplished by ignoring Soviet arms control violations and pretending that they do not exist. Arms control without Soviet compliance is nothing more than an exercise in unilateral disarmament. Arms control agreements must be complied with if there is any hope that they will increase our security.

The Soviet arms control compliance record must be taken fully into account when we formulate future arms control proposals. The fact that the Soviets have cheated in the past does not rule out the possibility of mutually beneficial agreements in the future, but it does rule out the type of ineffective agreements based upon wishful thinking that we have negotiated in the past—and which some proposed today.

We will continue to press the Soviets for corrective action. However, we must recognize that the problem of Soviet arms control violations has not yet been solved. We must, if we are not to face an expanding pattern of Soviet violations, see that such violations carry costs at least equal to the gains they derive from them. The full funding of the President's strategic weapons program is essential in view of these violations. We are now in the process of assessing the implications of these violations for our Mid- and long-term programs. It is clear, however, that the enormous momentum of the Soviet strategic weapons program continues largely unconstrained by existing treaties.●

THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, today, Monday, April 2, is an important day to those of us involved with the Great Lakes. Today we witness the opening of the St. Lawrence Seaway for another season, but even more important is the fact that this is the 25th anniversary season of this vital waterway. The construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway was an important step in opening world markets to Great Lake ports. But there is work left to be done, and the time to start is now.

The economic benefits of the international trade allowed by the seaway is hard to calculate in precise terms. But conservative estimates show that, for 1983, the seaway supplied $1 billion in direct economic benefits and $2 billion in indirect benefits to the Great Lakes States and neighboring Canadian Provinces. Also, the value of the cargo shipped through the seaway in 1983 was estimated at between $8 and $10 billion. These figures represent a slow season on the lakes. There is no telling how high these might have been had the lakes experienced a boom year like 1978.

The seaway enjoys a rich history of congressional and diplomatic triumphs. I could spend a substantial amount of time tracing congressional involvement from authorizing the seaway to the recent action forgiving the seaway debt. There is also much that could be said relative to the diplomatic successes of the seaway from establishing the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority to yearly toll negotiations. The diplomatic accomplishments alone are an impressive success story which should be a symbol of the possibilities of international cooperation.

But this 25th anniversary is not the time to dwell on the past. This is the time to recognize the challenges which lie ahead for the St. Lawrence Seaway: The need to improve its facilities and to encourage greater use of our northern seacoast as a means of transportation. Some of these problems can be addressed by Congress while others demand greater involvement by private interests.

While the St. Lawrence Seaway has provided wide ranging benefits to the Great Lakes, it has never reached its full potential. The locks are limited in length and depth. They can handle vessels no longer than 726 feet long and with drafts no more than 26 feet, precluding use by modern ships. The seaway also is limited by its single locking facilities, which only allow one-way traffic. These limitations cause serious bottlenecks and increase the cost of cargo. These are problems which Congress can and must address in the near future.

But these are problems which are beyond simple legislative action. I became aware of the problem when talking to Mr. Tom Burke, the port director of the Port of Cleveland and the president of the Council of Lake Erie Ports, who emphasized the need to encourage greater use of the Great Lake ports and the seaway. Many businesses in the region do not ship one item through these ports or the St. Lawrence Seaway. I think the time has come for businesses in the Great Lakes region to take a good, long look at our lake ports and St. Lawrence Seaway. If we in the Great Lakes region are going to compete in world markets and rebuild our economy, we will need the low-cost transportation offered by these ports and the seaway.

After 25 years. those of us who border on the lakes can give thanks for a great deal. But we also must look ahead to our new challenges. Through hard work and a good deal of cooperation, we can enjoy 25 years of even greater accomplishments.●

CIRCUS DADDY DAY

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I mention a very special event which is being held by a very special group of people in Detroit, Mich., today.

The International Order of Alhambra is a fraternal organization of Catholic men dedicated to assisting the mentally retarded. In an effort to bring joy and pleasure to those they are so dedicated to, the Michigan Council of Caravans is hosting "Circus Daddy Day." They have bought out the entire matinee performance of the Shrine Circus and the Alhambran "Daddies" will host more than 7,000 retarded, blind, and handicapped childrens' day at the circus. The children will not only enjoy the excitement of a day under the big top, but they will be treated to hotdogs, ice cream, and soft drinks. I am proud to salute these Michigan citizens and the outstanding, unselfish service they provide.

Nationally, the Alhambrans also help underwrite scholarships for teachers training in the work of mental retardation. Their efforts have not been confined to the United States but have also been extended to Japan, the West Indies, and Canada. Since 1958, the order has given more than $5 million to aid mentally retarded children. I commend the national Order of the Alhambra and particularly the Michigan Council of Caravans for all they do.●

APRIL IS FAIR HOUSING MONTH

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, April marks the 16th anniversary of the enactment of the Fair Housing Act—title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968.

It is a time of rededication for all Americans to the goal of title VIII to provide for fair housing. It is a time for the executive branch of Government to redouble its enforcement of the law of the land. And it is a time for us in the legislative branch to intensify our efforts to fill the enforcement gap of title VII.

Title VIII, the Fair Housing Act, was crafted almost entirely on the floor of the U.S. Senate. It explicitly stated that it is unlawful to refuse to sell or rent housing or to discriminate in the terms or conditions of such housing, its insuring, financing, advertising, or other offering because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. The legislation declared it unlawful to blockbust, redline, or otherwise make unavailable or deny housing to anyone because of those factors.

The act vested authority and repsonsiblity for administering the law with the Department of Housing and Urban Development, but provided very limited enforcement powers to HUD and limited remedies to the aggrieved person.

It is this enforcement gap which the Fair Housing Amendments Act (S. 1220 and H.R. 3482) seek to rectify.

April 4 also marks the 16th anniversary of the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. It is a tragic fact that Dr. King's death and the ensuing crisis in many of our Nation's cities were the catalyst for focussing Congress' efforts on passage of the 1968 Civil Rights Act. Dr. King was killed on April 4. The Civil Rights Act was signed into law on April 11. It is a sad commentary on the American political system that it took a martyrdom and growing civil unrest to spur the Congress and President to action in the area of civil rights.

But it need not be so. Just last month, our Nation lost a pillar of the civil rights movement, Clarence Mitchell. The hallmark of Mr. Mitchell's long and successful career in moving this country forward in its thinking and action on civil rights was his ability to forge quiet consensus.

For the past 8 years, I have watched a growing consensus form around fair housing legislation which I have been privileged to sponsor in this and the past three Congresses.

I have watched the bipartisan cosponsorship of it and its House companion grow over the years, as they garnered a broad constituency of support not only in the civil rights community, but among handicapped, labor, women, religious, senior citizen, Hispanic, and Asian-American groups; homebuilders; municipal officials; State attorneys general and human rights commissions; black real estate brokers; and constituencies within the real estate and housing management professions.

The bill over the years has received favorable testimony and constructive comment not only from the Department of Housing and Urban Development, but also the Department of Justice, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, and the Administrative Conference of the United States.

The bill fills the enforcement gap in title VIII by providing the Federal Government with cease and desist authority to hold the housing unit in question off the market while efforts at conciliation are made. It expands the time period for a person to file a charge of housing discrimination and sets times certain for HUD or a certified State or local agency to investigate, conciliate, and, if necessary, proceed to an administrative hearing and decision. It strengthens the penalties for violations of the fair housing law to make whole the victim of discrimination.

Lastly, it adds two protected classes to title VIII's protections: handicapped persons and families with children. I believe the evidence is clear that discrimination against these groups in housing is a problem of national proportions, and the 39 bipartisan Senate sponsors of this legislation I am sure join in this belief.

We have honed this legislation over the years as a result of extensive hearings, markups, and consultations with all parties concerned.

I regret that the election year pressures of this session of the 98th Congress seem to preclude us from moving this legislation through to enactment. I promise my colleagues and those who have worked closely with us on perfecting this legislation that it will again be a top legislative priority in the next Congress.

The problems of housing discrimination are with us today as much as ever. The practices may be somewhat more subtle, but the results are just as destructive—segregated housing, segregated schools, unequal housing opportunity, and higher social costs for all Americans.

We cannot rely solely on the good intentions of the private marketplace, voluntarism, and HUD public relations efforts to bring about true equal access to housing for all Americans.

Government has as much a responsibility to enforce civil rights as it ever did. We must not lose our precious civil rights gains through neglect, benign or otherwise. Nor can the Nation afford to let this festering problem become a national crisis before the national conscience is spurred to act. Let us in the Senate commit ourselves to having heard, marked up, and reported the Fair Housing Amendments Act by this time next April, so that we may rightfully celebrate the month of April as "Fair Housing Month."●

QUALITY EDUCATION IN AMERICA

● Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the issue of the quality of public education is one of great concern to all Americans. On August 26, 1981, the National Commission on Excellence in Education was directed by the President to present a report on the quality of education in America. In April 1983, the Commission released its report entitled "A Nation at Risk: The Imperative for Educational Reform," which showed that the quality of public education in this country was in need of major and immediate reforms. The report pointed to many problems in American education, including the quality of teachers and the apathy of students.

In light of these publicized shortcomings in our public schools, I am especially proud to share with the Members of the Senate the outstanding achievement of a sixth grade English class in New Gloucester, Maine. James Plummer, a sixth grade teacher at Memorial School in New Gloucester, is a dedicated and creative educator who motivated his class to compile a book of activities from the contributions of many artists and writers living in Maine. The children wrote to such noted people as Jamie Wyeth, Stephen King, and E. B. White and obtained original works with rights and royalties for publication. The book, entitled "A Gift From Maine," is a 160-page volume published by the Guy Gannett Publishing Co. in Portland, Maine.

Mr. Plummer's original objective was to teach his students basic skills while having them use their imagination and creativity. The idea grew into an exciting project as the class received responses from many of the artists and writers who volunteered to share their talents with the children. Each response received by the class was a gift to the children of James Plummer's sixth grade, hence the book's title, "A Gift from Maine."

I want to add my congratulations to those already received by Mr. Plummer and his students. I also want to commend the artists and writers who gave of themselves in an effort to spark creativity in young children in a public school setting. I believe the combination of James Plummer's creative teaching methods and his students' motivation to apply the skills and knowledge learned in the classroom to an exciting project, is an excellent example of the educational achievements we can expect from our Nation's public schools.●

EDWIN B. FORSYTHE

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, last week the State of New Jersey and the House of Representatives lost a very valuable Member of Congress, Ed Forsythe. I did not know Ed well, as we served together for only 1 year. However, I knew him by reputation long before I knew him as an individual. My deepest sympathy and prayers go to his family and friends.

Mr. President, Ed Forsythe was one of those Members of Congress who pursued his responsibilities quietly, but with commitment and dedication. His career in public service began over 30 years ago, when he served in a variety of capacities in his home town of Moorestown. Ultimately he went on to serve in the New Jersey legislature and was elected to Congress in 1970.

Ed was known by his constituents and colleagues as a thoughtful legislator; a man of principle, integrity and compassion; a man deeply committed to peace; and a man vitally concerned to protect our natural resources. As ranking member of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, Ed worked conscientiously to protect the fragile natural resources of his district and New Jersey. He was an extremely hard-working and careful legislator, who served his constituents and the Nation diligently.

All of us in New Jersey and the Congress will miss Ed. I extend my deepest condolences to his family and friends.●

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate then stand in recess until the hour of 2 p.m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I understand that following the recess, the Senate will resume consideration of House Joint Resolution 492, the urgent supplemental appropriations bill for the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 11 A.M.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, is there further business to come before the Senate? May I ask my good friend from West Virginia if he has any further business?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for his courtesy. I have none.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate now stand in recess until 11 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, at 7:04 p.m., recessed until Tuesday, April 3, 1984, at 11 a.m.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE MEESE AFFAIR

HON. LES ASPIN
OF WISCONSIN

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, the Army Reserve promotion given Presidential Counselor Edwin Meese III, raises fundamental questions about the integrity of the Reserve officer promotion system. This document reviews the Meese affair as a case study of the Reserve promotion system. The conclusion is that the system is vulnerable to manipulation, but not fundamentally flawed. In other words, there are problems that need to be addressed in order to insure both the integrity of the system and the appearance of integrity, but the system is not so foul as to require starting from scratch.

This report is not an investigative document based on interviews with or testimony from Edwin Meese; it is an effort not to fix blame or absolve any of the players in the Meese case, but rather to provide a narrative of the Meese case as an exposition of the problems that will continue to plague the Reserve promotion system unless corrective action is taken. This issue is of significance beyond the parochial concerns of the men and women in the Reserve system. The House Committee on Armed Services has sought to induce the services to place greater reliance on the Reserves. One impediment is lack of faith by the Active Forces in the Reserve promotion process. A promotion system in the Reserves that shares the same degree of integrity as that in the Active Forces is, therefore, very much in the interest of all those who wish to see the full promise of the Reserve system realized.

BACKGROUND

In January 1977, Edwin Meese approached the third anniversary of his promotion to lieutenant colonel in the Army Reserve. In the intervening years, he had not completed professional military education requirements—specifically, course work at the Command and General Staff College. Given that fact, and in accord with regulations, Meese was offered two alternatives: assignment to the retired Reserve, or discharge. Meese elected the former.

In June 1981, a few months after entering White House service, Meese expressed an interest in resuming active affiliation. This was reportedly expressed in an informal social setting in California with some high-ranking Reserve officials. Whether Meese's remarks were merely a passing bit of social chatter or were a definitive statement of what he had thought out and wished to see come to pass is beyond the scope of this document. It is clear, however, that his remarks were taken very seriously by a high-ranking Army Reserve officer in attendance because that officer set in motion a series of unusual personnel actions that resulted in Meese's return to active affiliation and promotion—all achieved with extraordinary speed.

The speed was dictated in part by legal necessity. Under the law, an officer of Meese's grade, lieutenant colonel, cannot serve on active status if he has more than 28 years and 30 days as a commissioned officer. That deadline for Meese was July 7, 1981. Another law provides that a Reserve officer assigned to the Selective Service System may be retained in active status, regardless of years of commissioned service, until age 60 if the Selective Service Director so chooses.

Faced with the July 7 deadline, Meese was transferred from the Retired Reserve to the Inactive Reserve on July 1. That same day, the Department of the Army directed that a position be established in the Selective Service System for an Army Reserve "Mobilization Designee." This refers to a position that will be filled by a specific reservist in the event of national mobilization. There are many thousands of such positions, which are not required in peacetime but which are considered essential once the Nation begins to mobilize its Active Forces, Guard, Reserves, and conscription system.

The next day, July 2, Meese was transferred from the Inactive Reserve to the Selective Service System. The July 7 deadline for his mandatory retirement was thus avoided and Meese could remain in active status.

On October 19, 1982, a board convened to consider promotions for Reserve officers to the grade of colonel. The following day, Meese took a physical examination. A physical exam is required before promotion board reviews. Meese has been ordered to take a routine exam no later than March 1982, but had failed to take it by that deadline.

Meese, however, still lacked the professional military education requirements for promotion to colonel. This would normally have involved course work at the Army Command and General Staff College at Fort Leavenworth, Kans. Regulations do provide, however, for alternative courses. In Meese's case he was given permission to take a substitute course in national security affairs given by the Industrial College of the Armed Forces (ICAF) at Fort McNair in Washington, D.C. Regulations also provide that officers whose practical experience in civilian life has given them unique capabilities may be given construction credit, that is, credit in lieu of completion of assigned academic work. On November 3, 1982, the Director of the Selective Service System requested that Meese be given constructive credit in lieu of completing the national security course at ICAP. The constructive credit was based on Meese's experience in the national security field by virtue of being an aide to the President.

In sum, Meese was given constructive credit in lieu of a course of study that was to be taken in lieu of the military requirement that was to have been completed almost 6 years earlier.

On November 8, approval of Meese's constructive credit was sent to the promotion board. The board adjourned on November 19. The following February 24, Meese was confirmed as one of the board's selectees for promotion to colonel in the Army Reserve.

EVALUATION

Exceptions and waivers are normal in any administrative system. They are essential to provide flexibility to address anomalies so that the goals of an organization are not tripped up by the letter of its own rules. In this case, the number of waivers granted, the often tortuous procedures applied, and the expeditious processing undertaken were unusual, though not necessarily unique. In general, regulations were complied with, though in a few instances the rules were simply ignored.

Reactivation: Meese was originally placed on the retired list because he had failed to complete the required professional military education. He was restored to active status without fulfilling that requirement. The requirement was not fulfilled until 16 months after Meese's return to active status.

Assignment to Selective Service: No effort was made to fulfill the requirement to justify the creation of the new mobilization designee position at

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Selective Service. That would obviously have been no more than a bureaucratic exercise, however, since it is quite clear from the timing that the position was dreamed up for Meese in order to get around the deadline for his mandatory retirement.

Designation as mobilization asset: A mobilization designee must be available in the event of mobilization. Because of concern that too many Federal employees were simultaneously reservists and holders of key civilian Government positions, Congress directed several years ago that the availability of mobilization designees be reviewed at least annually. Those not available are not to be assigned to such mobilization positions. It strains credulity that anyone could believe that, in the event of war, a principal assistant to the President would traipse off to the Selective Service System to help process draftees. Those who made the decision to install Meese at Selective Service clearly placed the personal benefit of the mobilization designee above the national security policy they were tasked with fulfilling.

Promotion: It appears that Meese's name and record were not presented to the promotion board in normal sequence, but in a manner that highlighted Meese in contrast with other candidates. While perhaps not a violation of the rules, this is certainly a violation of the spirit of the promotion board process, which was designed in part to prevent individuals from receiving special consideration. Such consideration was practically required to make Meese competitive before the board. Other indicators in his file—the failure to perform any military duty in the preceding 6 years, and the need for constructive credit twice removed to fulfill an educational requirement, for example—should otherwise have placed Meese far down the list when compared with officers who had demonstrated skill and dedication over years of weekend, summer, and evening work.

IMPLICATIONS

The Reserve personnel system was twisted, bent, and bullied in order to provide Meese with a return to active status and a promotion. There are several concerns here.

Promotion system integrity: The promotion system is designed to select men and women for higher rank based on their demonstrated capability. As such, the promotion system must be not only fair, but also perceived as fair in order to inspire confidence in the system among aspiring officers. Such manipulation as was seen in the Meese case can only have a depressing effect on morale and could also encourage others to seek promotions through manipulation rather than performance.

Reserve integration with Active Forces: The Active Forces too often look down their noses at the Reserve Forces. One constant complaint relates to the Reserve promotion system, which is commonly viewed as inferior and untrustworthy. That complaint is regularly used to oppose proposals to give the Reserve Forces a greater role in the national defense. Instances such as the Meese case further erode confidence in the system, making it harder to achieve the greater Active Reserve integration which has long been pursued by the House Committee on Armed Services.

Personal benefits: Meese did not stand to profit personally from his return to active status because he was not performing drills, which are necessary to gain pay and retirement benefits. However, his promotion to the grade of colonel automatically raised the retirement benefit for which he will ultimately be eligible by about one-fourth. Apart from the financial implications, it is clear that high-ranking officers of the Army Reserve went to great lengths to fulfill a wish expressed by Meese where the goal was clearly not national security but personal gratification.

POLICY CONSIDERATIONS

Two areas of systemic weakness are highlighted by the Meese case, one a flaw in design and the other a flaw in operation. Together they permitted, or failed to prevent, abuse of the process.

First, in order to be considered for promotion, a Reserve officer need not have actively participated for any minimum time. The officer need only be in active status at the time the promotion board convenes. This arrangement exalts active status as a goal worth achieving solely for its own sake. It invites the loss of perspective and manipulation of process seen in the Meese case.

Second, the mechanism for screening from the Ready Reserve those key Government employees who would be needed in their civilian jobs in the event of national emergency must be taken more seriously. As much as any other aspect of the Reserve concept, this mechanism cannot afford to address the eventuality of mobilization with a nudge and a wink. Practically speaking, the procedure for evaluating key personnel suffers from a lack of clear standards, definitions, and priorities. Furthermore, screening is not sufficiently strict.

Mobilization designee positions are, by definition, key positions in time of war. For that reason, the law allows reservists filling such positions of skill who would otherwise be retired to remain in active status. For the same reason—the significance of the position in time of war—these slots must not be filled by reservists who obviously would have other, more important, duties to perform by virtue of their key civilian positions.

To allow someone with such a key civilian post to avoid retirement from the Reserves by taking advantage of the tenured nature of a mobilization designee position is nothing short of an abuse of the system. The door to continued active status is opened by the tenure provided by mobilization designee status; that door, however, must be closed to reservists who quite clearly cannot be expected to appear upon national mobilization.

Fortunately, the Reserve officer personnel management system is not readily susceptible of abuse. It is, however, susceptible of improvement. That improvement should be effected by comprehensive legislation, standardizing the provisions for appointment, promotion, separation, and retirement of Reserve officers and including specific provisions establishing: First, active participation of some specified recency and duration as one criterion for eligibility for promotion; and second, statutory guidelines for screening key personnel.●

SUBMINIMUM PAY NEEDED

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an editorial from the March 16, 1984 edition of the Oxnard Press-Courier, Oxnard, Calif. It makes a compelling argument as to why Congress should enact subminimum wage legislation to encourage the creation of summer jobs for teenage unemployed. Specifically, this legislation would address the incredibly high unemployment rate suffered by black teenagers across the Nation.

The article follows:

SUBMINIMUM PAY NEEDED

The summer subminimum wage proposed by the Reagan administration must be passed if Congress is serious about reducing black teen-age unemployment.

The Reagan proposal lowers the minimum wage from $3.35 an hour to $2.50 an hour for workers under age 22 who are hired between May and September. The administration hopes to cut the appalling 50 percent black teen-age unemployment rate by making unskilled youths more attractive to employers looking for summer help.

Black teen-agers suffer from high unemployment because they lack job skills. And they lack job skills, in part, because the minimum wage has priced unskilled labor out of the job market. Consequently, by the time these youths reach their 22nd birthdays, they are essentially nonpersons—having no job experience, no references and no employment opportunities.

Decreasing the minimum wage by 75 cents will not mean sweatshop wages for black teen-agers. Rather, it will help them obtain jobs simply because labor is more affordable when it is inexpensive. From 1890 to 1930, before there was a minimum wage, employment levels for blacks and whites were even.

In the late 1940s, before the minimum wage began growing by leaps and bounds, black teen-age unemployment was less than or equal to white teen-age unemployment. Today, the unemployment rate for black teen-agers is double the rate for teen-agers as a whole.

The Reagan administration has been joined by the National Conference of Black Mayors to exert a "full-court press" on behalf of the summer subminimum wage. But many liberal congressmen are reluctant to go along. They assert that subminimum-wage teen-agers will replace more highly paid adults.

The summer subminimum wage, however, is specifically targeted for the months when youths are hired for summer jobs.

And just to ensure that unemployment is not merely shifted from the young to the old, the Labor Department has promised to impose sanctions on employers who dump older workers for subminimum wage employees.

Fundamentally, the liberals' contention that every job gained by a subminimum-wage youth will be at the expense of a higher-paid adult represents a basic misunderstanding of the American economy. Each new worker does not necessarily replace an old one. Productive workers expand the economy and create more job opportunities.

Indeed, the subminimum wage would create service-related jobs that business currently can't afford to offer—delivery boys, ushers, elevator operators, etc.

Certain members of Congress have been good at decrying President Reagan's efforts on behalf of the poor and disadvantaged, but they have been very bad at doing anything more for them than keeping them on the dole. The subminimum wage should be enacted before schools close for summer vacation.●

THELMA CHAMBERS: COMMUNITY LEADER

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, one of our finest community leaders has been featured in the Plain Dealer. Thelma Chambers is a credit to the Near West Side of Cleveland.

SHE FIGHTS TO MAKE THE WORLD BETTER FOR HER SON

When Thelma Chambers makes a snack, she prepares at least twice as much as she can eat. She knows that somebody will stop by for a chat, and fixing it ahead of time saves an extra trip to the kitchen.

A slumber party atmosphere prevails when Chambers' friends flock into her living room, but there also is a serious undertone: these Near West Siders are joining forces to save their neighborhood.

When Chambers was a young woman, no one would have expected her to become a public figure, even in a movement to save a neighborhood. She married young and her life revolved around her home. After moving to Cleveland from West Virginia in 1959, she spent several years managing fast food stores.

All of this changed after her son Alford Jr. was born in 1968 and she decided that she did not want him to grow up in the environment she saw around her.

"During the early 1970s, glue sniffing among neighborhood youths was a serious problem and one incident made Chambers take action: "There was this young man out on my tree lawn so gone from sniffing glue that he was just lying there and staring into a thunderstorm."

At the urging of Chambers and other concerned parents, Mary Rose Oakar, then a Cleveland councilwoman, pushed a ban on the sale of glue to minors through council. Ohio Sen. Charles Butts (D-23) agreed to introduce a bill in the legislature calling for such a ban on a state-wide basis.

Chambers said she was harassed during this time: "People would throw eggs at my house and drive by and call me all kinds of names like 'busybody.' They didn't want their source (of glue) to dry up and knew I was leading the fight against its sale. I was terrified by what they were doing and there were times when the noise kept me up all night."

From then on more issues came to the force in Chambers' life, like the movement against arson. The anti-arson effort was started in 1978 when residents grew increasingly more despondent at seeing the Near West Side turned into an inferno. It represented a joint effort of neighbors in action and the West Side Community House.

Chambers, who had been working on desegregation issues, was assigned to spearhead the drive. She and others went door-to-door encouraging people to report any information they had about suspicious fires. Also, signs were posted throughout the neighborhood announcing a $10,000 reward for tips leading to an arson conviction.

Through Project Secure, vacant and vandalized houses were boarded up preventing would-be arsonists from gaining entrance. In time the hard work began paying off. Arson dropped drastically, as much as 50 percent in one year.

Chambers found that in most projects that caught her interest she had to take the first steps alone and then involve others. When the going gets tough she thinks about her son and the world she hopes he will have.

One particularly painful incident occurred during her efforts to aid peaceful desegregation. Many parents agreed to take a tour of the East Side schools their children would be attending, but when the day arrived Chambers was the only person to board the bus bound for Glenville.

"It was a cold . . . cold . . . morning and I went through a whole range of emotions riding alone on that bus. At first I felt ashamed for all of the people who had said, 'I want to see what is over there,' but never came out to see what was going on. I felt shame and then anger. I was also more than a bit embarrassed. Things went from bad to worse when I got to the school and they had a welcoming committee and whole trays of food. I didn't know what to do."

Chambers prefers not to dwell on the past but she is enthusiastic about recounting the victories—like the role she and her ragtag army played in bringing the distribution of government surplus cheese closer to people. The cheese was being passed out from local social service centers and community houses when Chambers arranged to have the Divine Free Will Baptist Church, 2130 W. 42d St., used as a distribution point.

This arrangement made matters easier for senior citizens and women with children, who might otherwise have had to wait in line for hours. Chambers also said that because of the change, "Many of the people who came to get the cheese volunteered to help . . . They said 'Let me unload or do anthing else you need.' By helping they were able to keep their dignity. They'd fallen onto hard times but were still able to help out and feel better about themselves."

The atmosphere was almost jovial when food was passed out from the church. Chambers said the job left her exhausted but exhilarated, and she enjoyed "meeting folks she had not seen in a while."

When a Convenient Food Mart was to be built at 3919 Lorain Ave., Chambers and other activists told company officials, "We don't think this neighborhood can support another store and we don't want another vacant building if it fails." The group also objected to plans to sell alcohol on the basis it would attract the wrong element.

But a sense of cooperation rather than confrontation turned the store into a showplace that hired neighborhood people.

Chambers' contributions to the Near West Side are even more impressive when one considers that diabetes limits her mobility and strength. She often works from a wheelchair, relying heavily on the telephone.

But the question remains: Can activism hold back the deterioration that continues at an alarming rate? Michael O'Brien, former president of Near West Neighbors in Action, said, "We are running as fast as we can just to stay in one place. Yet, if all the activists had not been putting an immense amount of energy into making things better . . . things would be getting worse . . . much worse."

Cleveland Councilwoman Helen Smith (D-14) said activism must not be overlooked: "They (neighborhood residents) feel that they have made an impact . . . that they are doing something about a problem. This is the first step in getting a problem solved even if it is still with us."●

CHICAGO TRIBUNE CALLS FOR PUBLIC OFFERING OF CONRAIL STOCK

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Department of Transportation is currently engaged in efforts to return Conrail to the private sector. Unfortunately, the Department's efforts to date appear to reflect a purely political decision to sell Conrail hastily before the election.

Many experts, including the Department's own investment banker, Goldman, Sachs, have recommended that the Department seriously consider a public offering of Conrail's stock. Despite many advantages of a public offering, the Department has rejected that approach. It prefers to sell Conrail quickly.

The Chicago Tribune recently considered three options for the sale of Conrail—breaking up Conrail, sale to another railroad, or a public offering.

The Tribune concluded that a public offering makes the most sense. The editorial follows:

[From the Chicago Tribune, Mar. 22, 1984]

THE RAILROAD RENAISSANCE

The federal government is slowly moving toward resolving the final problem that remains from the financial collapse of the railroad system in the Northeast more than a decade ago.

Through a succession of federal actions during the last decade the six bankrupt Northeast carriers, including the Penn Central, were eventually merged into a single government-sponsored railroad called the Consolidated Rail Corporation, or more commonly, Conrail. Washington also plowed nearly $3.3 billion into Conrail to enable it to correct years of neglect of its tracks and equipment and loosened the labyrinth of regulatory restraints that had contributed to the original collapse.

A rebuilt, financially healthy Conrail is now emerging from the federal cocoon, and the major question is what to do with it.

The Northeast Rail Service Act of 1981 requires that the federal government dispose of its 85 percent common stock interest in Conrail. The Reagan administration has considered a number of options, like breaking up Conrail and selling its pieces to other railroads, the sale of the entire railroad to another corporation or the sale of the government's Conrail stock to the public.

The last option makes the most sense.

There is simply no way to break up Conrail for sale to other railroads. Conrail has two principal east-west lines to split among the other five major railroads in the nation.

The sale by the government of its Conrail stock to the public simply returns Conrail as it now exists to the private sector without favoring or discriminating against the rest of the industry. That option would also ensure that the Northeast would have a railroad oriented to its special transportation needs and problems.

The time may come when the nation needs a truly transcontinental railroad stretching from New York to California, but the government should not force that decision before its time has come.●

THE LATE HONORABLE CLARENCE MITCHELL, JR.

HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 27, 1984

● Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my colleagues in paying tribute to Clarence Mitchell, Jr., whose untimely death was a great loss to our Nation.

No one who has served in this body during the last three decades could have failed to know Clarence Mitchell, either personally or by reputation. His dedication to the advancement of civil rights and his relentless quest to improve the quality of life in America is without parallel.

He was a familiar figure in the Halls of Congress, working both sides of the aisle on behalf of legislation that was intended to make ours a more just society. His work won him many awards, including the Presidential Medal of Freedom, but I think it is fair to say that his memory will be most appropriately remembered through the landmark civil rights legislation he helped to craft: the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Voting Rights Act of 1965, and the Fair Housing Act of 1968.

Clarence Mitchell was a man who dreamed great dreams and a man who knew that those dreams would not become a reality without hard work and dedication. He labored on behalf of the dream of equal opportunity at a time when such labor was difficult and thankless, and progress was slow. In large part because of Clarence Mitchell's courage and commitment, however, we have, over the last 30 years, taken steps as a nation on the path toward equal justice.

Clarence Mitchell's dream has not yet been fully realized, but we are closer to it today because he lived and worked among us. His passing leaves us saddened because there is much yet to do, but his life remains as a beacon to guide us toward the goal of full equality for all Americans.

I want to extend my sincere condolences to the distinguished Mitchell family, to Clarence's wife, sons, and grandchildren, and to his brother, our colleague, Congressman PARREN MITCHELL. Although Clarence Mitchell's life has ended, his memory and spirit will endure.●

HELP EL SALVADOR

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the following editorial from the New York Post, written by Max Singer, I believe articulately and clearly expresses the views of many interested in providing El Salvador with sufficient assistance in order to insure a fair and safe election. I highly recommend this editorial to all of my colleagues.

The article follows:

WHY WE MUST HELP EL SALVADOR NOW

The Pentagon has told Congress that the Salvadoran army will collapse unless that country gets $95 million in emergency aid from the U.S. President Reagan's request for that assistance goes before the Senate Appropriations Committee today, Ed.

While the countries of Central America are still poor, and have unequal income distributions, the primary cause of the current conflict is not economic, social, or political injustice.

The current conflict results from an attempt by small groups of ideological extremists to take power—from successful prodemocratic revolutions.

In the years between 1960 and the revolutions of 1979, average incomes in Nicaragua and El Salvador had been growing at about 2 percent a year (the same rate U.S. incomes grew during our advance from poverty in the 1800s).

Infant mortality had been declining fast (down almost one half in El Salvador and over one-third in Nicaragua).

Health had been improving rapidly (life expectancy up 12 years in El Salvador and 9 years in Nicaragua).

The proportion of children in school was going up (to over 26 percent in secondary school in both El Salvador and Nicaragua—compared to only 13 percent and 7 percent in 1960).

In 1979, this social progress was jolted by political programs with the ending of dictatorships or military governments in El Salvador and Nicargua, as well as in Honduras (which had also seen substantial social and economic progress).

It was after these two decades of progress that the current counter-revolutionary conflict began with Sandinista seizure of power in 1979 (not from Somoza, but from the Sandinistas"; allies in the revolution against Somoza) and the formation in 1980 of a guerrilla army to attack the revolutionary governing Junta (JRG) in El Salvador.

The extremists needed to prevent the success of the moderate revolutions for social justice that had been made by groups committed to democracy.

The extremists against whom the U.S. is fighting are not driven by the need to achieve social progress. They are fighting for sectarian power (although they know that their fight for power sets back social progress).

They do not represent the people. Since their actions came after the real revolution, they came too late to be "historically inevitable."

They have been effective, not because of their popularity or the justice of their cause, but because they have massive and expert help from outside. (Cuba has more than 10 times as many people in Nicaragua as we have in El Salvador).

Other countries where the poverty and injustice is worse, and progress slower or not yet really begun, do not have such a violent conflict.

Therefore, while it is undoubtedly true that poverty is a significant fact in Central America, it is not what has produced or what sustains the current crisis and war.

Working against poverty and injustice, while it is desirable, is not a useful way to deal with the current violent conflict. The opposite approach is more realistic.

Instead of solving the conflict by dealing with injustice, it is necessary to deal with injustice by solving the conflict.

The necessary first step to substantial economic, social, or human rights progress in El Salvador is to end the war.

Since the "hearts and minds" of the great majority of the people have already rejected the guerrillas—despite the crimes of some government supporters and army officers—the only way to end the war in El Salvador is to defeat the guerrillas.

The guerrillas must be defeated because they are murderous, unpopular, present no just claim, and cannot be satisfied except with complete power.

When the guerrillas have been defeated, the great share of the killings in El Salvador will end automatically, and the government will be able to turn all its efforts to surpressing the small forces of the extreme right who have been able to operate under the cover of the war against the guerrillas.

There is much experience to indicate that those who don't try to gain a victory for the democratic side, who sit on the fence or devote their efforts to seeking a non-existent "middle way," will turn out to have helped bring about an extension of totalitarianism and a defeat for human rights.

Idealistic Americans should be urging our government much more strongly to support the democratic side in the life-or-death struggle for human rights in Central America.

A victory for the other side is likely in a few years to bring human rights in Central America to as low a level as human rights in Eastern Europe.●

THE LAW AND EDWARD MEESE

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, Prof. Stephen Gillers of the New York University School of Law and 41 of his colleagues at various law schools sent a memorandum of law of Senator STROM THURMOND, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, on March 21, 1984. This memorandum points out that "on facts similar to those that have transpired at the Meese hearings, Grand Juries have indicted, trial juries have convicted, and Federal judges have incarcerated other Government employees." So that my colleagues have an opportunity to review this material, I will place it in the RECORD over the next week. Today, I will place in the RECORD the cover letter to Senator THURMOND and the statement of facts from the memorandum:

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY, SCHOOL OF LAW,
New York, N.Y., March 21, 1984.

Hon. STROM THURMOND,
Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR THURMOND: In connection with the nomination of Edwin Meese to be Attorney General of the United States, I am enclosing a copy of a memorandum, dated March 15, 1984, and signed by 42 American law professors. As the memorandum concludes:

The record so far raises serious questions about Edwin Meese's criminal and civil liability in connection with the loans and gifts to, or for the benefit of, himself and his family. On facts similar to those that have transpired at the Meese hearings, Grand Juries have indicted, trial juries have convicted, and federal judges have incarcerated other government employees. The Senate, its Judiciary Committee, and the American people deserve a fully developed record clearly establishing that there is no probable cause to suspect Mr. Meese of committing a federal crime or violating a federal civil law or rule. If Mr. Meese is confirmed on an inadequate record and new facts then come to light requiring further inquiry, the disruption in the administration of justice will be severe and intolerable.

We hope the enclosed legal analysis is helpful to the Committee in connection with its constitutional task.

Sincerely yours,

STEPHEN GILLERS,
Professor of Law.

MEMORANDUM

Re Federal criminal and civil sanctions applicable to activities of Edwin Meese.
Date: March 15, 1984.

This memorandum will first address the federal criminal statutes that are implicated by Edwin Meese's possible role in securing administration positions for those who have helped to assuage his personal financial crises. It will also address Executive Order No. 11222, Standards of ethical conduct for government officers and employees, which supports the expansive interpretation by both the legislature and the judiciary of the federal bribery and conflict of interest statutes that are relevant here. As set forth more fully below, the connection between Meese's governmental and personal interests was repeatedly suggested at the confirmation hearings held during the week of March 5th on Meese's suitability for the position of Attorney General.

Part Two of this memo comprises a discussion of the Executive Personnel Financial Requirements as they apply to Meese's failure to report an approximately $15,000 interest-free loan provided by a family friend to Meese's wife, as well as his failure to disclose a "gift" in the form of forbearance on interest due from another loan provided by his personal accountant.

One notable aspect of the prohibitions discussed below is that few have been applied to defendants who even approach Meese's stature as a public official. None of the federal criminal statutes have been applied to defendants who are high-ranking officials in the Executive Department. This appearance of unequal or selective prosecution in the application of the federal prohibitions against conflict of interest should infuse the arguments for a more extensive investigation of Meese's activities with a special urgency. The appearance of leniency by the Justice Department toward high-ranking public officials is especially questionable when the public official concerned is also the nominee for the country's chief law enforcement officer.

SUMMARY OF CONCLUSION

The record so far raises serious questions about Edwin Meese's criminal and civil liability in connection with the loans and gifts to, or for the benefit of, himself and his family. On facts similar to those that have transpired at the Meese hearings, Grand Juries have indicated, trial juries have convicted, and federal judges have incarcerated other government employees. The Senate, its Judiciary Committee, and the American people deserve a fully developed record clearly establishing that there is no probable cause to suspect Mr. Meese of committing a federal crime or violating a federal civil law or rule. If Mr. Meese is confirmed on an inadequate record and new facts then come to light requring further inquiry, the disruption in the administration of justice will be severe and intolerable.

I. FEDERAL CRIMINAL PROHIBITIONS APPLICABLE TO ACTIVITIES OF EDWIN MEESE

Facts: During the week of March 5, 1984, the Senate Committee's concern with Meese's financial embarassments focused on this involvement in personal financial transactions with persons who later received Reagan Administration appointments.

The Senate Committee scrutinized with particular care the connection between the financing of the sale of Meese's home in California and the subsequent appointment to Administration positions of three of the financiers. The California house had been on the market for 20 months, causing Meese to incur debts of nearly half a million dollars and to fall 15 months behind on several mortgages and loan debts, including a four-month delinquency on the mortgage for Meese's house in Virginia. Meese testified that friends began to assist in the search for a buyer in August, 1982. More specifically, Thomas J. Barrack, a California real estate developer, not only found a buyer and arranged for bank financing, but also lent a friend $70,000 to be used as a down payment on the $307,500 home. Further, Barrack testified that he later forgave the loan, thus effectively contributing $70,000 to Meese's proceeds from the sale. Barrack also acknowledged that he discussed a position with the Reagan Administration two weeks after arranging the sale of Meese's house. Three months later, Barrack was appointed to serve as the assistant secretary of the Interior. See The Washington Post, March 3, 1984, A1, March 4, A22, March 6, A3; The New York Times, March 3, 1984, A2, March 4, D2, March 7, A17.

The sale of the house was financed by Great American Federal Savings and Loan, which had continued to lend Meese money even after he had incurred more than $400,000 in debt and had fallen 15 months behind in loan payments. Moreover, the purchase was financed at 11 percent interest at a time when the prime interest rate was 14 percent. Gordon Luce, chairman of the bank and former head of the California Republican Party, was named an alternate delegate to the United Nations. Edwin Gray, a senior vice president of the bank, was named chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board by Reagan. WP, NYT, supra.

Meese testified that he did not know how Barrack financed the purchase and he was not instrumental in arranging the positions. But Senator Metzenbaum confronted Meese with handwritten notes, taken in an August, 1982 conversation between Meese and Barrack, in which Barrack outlined the deal and Meese indicated that he wanted an approach that "avoids publicity", "filters one level" of the transaction, and makes it an "arms length" deal. NYT, March 3, A2.

Meese's contention that he was not involved in the appointment of those who have assuaged his financial woes was undercut by John McKean, Meese's personal accountant, who had testified at his own confirmation hearings that his appointment to the board of governors of the United States Postal Service was recommended by Meese and Deaver. At the Senate hearings on Meese's nomination, McKean acknowledged he had not disclosed at his confirmation hearings that he had arranged approximately $60,000 in loans for Meese just one month prior to his nomination. McKean had also failed to reveal—and Meese failed to report on his Executive financial statement, infra at II—his forbearance on interest due from Meese on the loan during the time he was being considered for the post office appointment. STAR WARS AND COSTLY MIRAGES

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, two recent decisions by the Reagan administration have brought the specter of nuclear weapons in space closer to realization.

In late February, the administration announced it would not negotiate an agreement with the Soviet Union to prevent the deployment of nuclear weapons in space. President Reagan stated that such an agreement was meaningless because it could not be verified. Not only is this statement inaccurate, it shows that the administration will not take the initiative to insure the future safety of world civilization.

In March, the administration announced the appointment of Lt. Gen. James Abrahamson to direct the strategic defense initiative. It is not coincidental that, as NASA Associate Administrator, General Abrahamson has been in charge of the space shuttle project. I find it disturbing that a major purpose of our NASA program is now to assist in the arming of the last nuclear-free zone.

Several of my longstanding concerns are echoed in an editorial published in the Milwaukee Journal on November 1, 1983. I have included this editorial with my statement in the hope that we may all understand the ramifications of nuclear weapons in space.

[From the Milwaukee Journal, Nov. 1, 1983]

STAR WARS AND COSTLY MIRAGES

The Pentagon has come up with a new proposal to build space-based weapons and other methods to intercept attacking nuclear ballistic missiles. The scheme would be merely goofy, like a Rube Goldberg contraption, were it not so futile, expensive and dangerous.

The proposal, recently forwarded to the White House, was the work of a committee headed by Defense Secretary Casper Weinberger and National Security Adviser William Clark. The system would use lasers and other technologies and cost $18 billion to $27 billion over the next five years.

Admittedly, it has a superficial appeal. The case was stated by President Reagan in his "Star Wars" speech last March 23, in which he called on scientists "to give us the means of rendering . . . nuclear weapons impotent and obsolete."

It would be wonderful if this country and the Soviet Union could devise ways to protect themselves from each other. It would allow each side, and the world to breathe much easier.

The problem is, any anti-missile system would have to be 100 percent perfect. Not 99 percent, but 100 percent. The reason is that each of the warheads in the arsenals of the superpowers packs a wallop powerful enough to wreck a city. If the umbrella leaked—even a drop—millions could die.

A perfect defense against nuclear attack would be worth at least $18 billion to $27 billion. But, since perfection this side of heaven is impossible, the money would be wasted. In short, the system would be a futile expense.

Embarking on development of such an anti-missile system also would be dangerous, because it might tempt one side to attack the other quickly, before the adversary had a chance to erect the protective umbrella. Almost certainly it would encourage the two sides to seek new weapons that could penetrate the defense of the other. Thus, the arms race would be energized, not reversed.

Years ago, the two superpowers realized that they could protect themselves only by threatening would-be attackers with certain and devastating reprisals. To increase the deterrent effect, the US and the Soviet Union agreed, in the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972, "not to develop, test or deploy ABM systems or components which are sea-based, air-based, space-based or mobile land-based."

Any significant ABM system would probably require violation or renegotiation of that treaty, an act that in turn might lead to the unraveling of the entire fabric of arms control agreements.

To be sure, the idea of protecting world peace by threatening world war is ironic, distasteful and maybe even a little crazy. But it's not as bad as chasing a mirage. And a mirage is what a missile-defense system really is.●

A TRIBUTE TO CHARLES W. HOLMES

HON. MARVIN LEATH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. LEATH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, it saddens me to report the untimely death of a trusted and loyal friend and confidant, a man who exhibited the perfect combination of integrity, humility, and pure commonsense throughout his professional career. Charles Holmes, 52, died of cardiac arrest March 27 at George Washington University Hospital following emergency open heart surgery. Charlie had served as my administrative assistant and press secretary since 1979.

Active over the years in House and Senate organizations of press and administrative aides, Charlie Holmes was a well-respected figure on Capitol Hill. A professional in every sense, Charlie was one of those rare individuals who settled for nothing short of excellence and whose efforts and distinguished career will continue to inspire those of us who worked with him.

Born in Michigan, he moved with his familiy at age 3 to McAllen, Tex. He earned degrees from Texas A&I and Penn State and was a lieutenant in the Air Force during the Korean conflict and post-conflict.

From 1957 to 1966, Charlie wrote sports and news articles for the Dallas Times Herald and covered the Dallas Cowboys when the team was organized. He was an editorial writer for the San Diego Evening Tribune before moving to Washington in 1969 as press aide to former U.S. Senator Ralph Yarborough of Texas.

From 1971 to 1975, Charlie was an aide to former Houston Representative Bob Eckhardt. In 1976, he became press secretary for the election campaign of U.S. Senator JIM SASSER of Tennessee. He managed my campaigns for the U.S. House in 1977 and 1978.

Our prayers go out to Charlie's family who, only 11 days prior, learned of the death of Charlie's brother, Bill, of Waco, Tex. We pray that his two sons, Eric Thomas, of West Point, N.Y., and Charles W., Jr., of Austin, Tex.; his daughter, Jane Ariel of McAllen, Tex.; and his sister, Virginia Polfus, of Mercedes, Tex., will be given strength to accept and strength to endure.

Recently, I read of a reference to the planet Earth as "a medium-size planet attached to an ordinary star at the edge of a run-of-the-mill galaxy." On first thought, that seems pretty accurate.

But when you take into account the caretakers of this satellite we call home—the people—then significance begins to take shape.

Then, you consider the individuals who rise above the crowd—people like Charlie Holmes. They are the ones who do not wait on direction, or mandate, or law but, instead, act on need and a spirit of brotherhood.

It is because of these individuals that this planet is more than significant—it is impressive.

Charlie Holmes will be greatly missed.●

FAMILY TRIBUTE TO CHARLES LEE HOUSER, 1933-83

HON. JOHN McCAIN

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to bring to my colleagues attention to a very tragic accident which occurred last December.

Charles Houser, Congressional Affairs Officer for the Bureau of Land Management, was injured in a helicopter crash while looking at some of the wilderness areas proposed in H.R. 4707. He later died on December 31, 1983, as a result of the accident.

We all respected Charlie for his knowledge and professionalism. He was also one of the warmest and most personable people I have ever known. We miss him and deeply regret that his death was in some ways caused by our push to enact an Arizona wilderness bill this year.

The following is the family's tribute to Charlie which I believe should be entered in the RECORD at this point.

Charlie Lee Houser, the fifth of six children, was born September 22, 1933 to Alice Moss Houser and the late Robert Lee Houser in Prattville, Alabama. After sustaining injuries in a helicopter accident in Arizona on December 8, 1983, he departed this life at the Washington Hospital Center on December 31, 1983.

He was an active and supportive member of the St. Martin's Catholic Church and enjoyed working with the St. Vincent de Paul Society, a society that dedicated themselves in helping the needy of Washington, D.C.

He attended public schools in Alabama and graduated with honors from Alabama State College in 1961. He enhanced his career by enrolling in courses at George Washington University and the Graduate School of Agriculture. He was also affiliated with and held office in the Alabama State Alumni Association which he enjoyed and worked with dedication and enthusiasm.

Charlie enlisted in the U.S. Marine Corps from 1953-57, serving in Okinawa, Thailand, Formosa, the Philippines and Japan. He still held the Corps dear to his heart and believed that when you "looked on heaven scenes the streets would be guarded by the United States Marines."

Charlie came to Washington, D.C. in 1962 to fulfill his ambition and use his talents. Although a newcomer to this area, he learned the "ropes" quickly. He first lived with a Baptist cousin who introduced him to the girl who subsequently became his wife. Lionella (nee Stuckey) and Charlie were joined in Holy Matrimony at St. Martins Catholic Church in 1964. From this union a loving daughter, Karen Linnea was born January 15, 1969.

Charlie's personal attributes benefitted him not only in his business and professional areas, but his warm, good natured attitude, coupled with his reputation of confidence, dedication and cooperative assistance extended to his home life as well. As a husband, Charlie's success as a loving, dependable, strong person are traits to which his wife can attest. She likes to believe his easy-going nature is an answer to her prayer for a mate that could "get along with" her personality. Fond memories of her life with him will help her sustain his loss.

Charles, without a doubt, was his daughter Karen's "favorite Dad." He was her chauffeur, basketball rooter, TV game viewer, church accompanist, her bank, seafood provider, lecturer, bikeriding and swimming partner, phone screener and all the things that go along with a good dad.

Charles liked quartet singing, fishing, hunting, baseball and swimming and riding through the South to visit his home place in Prattville to farm, relax and tan. It was there that he really enjoyed his family—particularly his loving mother, his brother Mack, sister Earlene and then on to Birmingham to visit his other sister, Frances, and brothers, Will and Buddy.

Charles was an ambitious young man who knew that if he got an opportunity he could prove himself. He started his career as a mail clerk with the General Service Administration and gave his all to this job. He later transferred to the Department of Interior where he was employed for over 20 years. He held positions as Procurement Assistant, Cooperative Relations Specialist, Chief of Branch of Office Services and at the time of his death was Congressional Liaison Officer, Bureau of Land Management, Department of the Interior. He enjoyed his work and took great pride in doing the best job he could. His assistance in the Department as congressional informational programs and inquiries, and briefing preparations has earned him numerous Letters of Commendations, Outstanding Awards and most of all, the respect of his colleagues and members of Congress.

We all loved Charlie and will miss him greatly, but God's perfect will has been carried out. "The blessing of the Lord it maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it."

He leaves to cherish his memory a loving and devoted wife, Mrs. Lionella Stuckey Houser; one daughter, Karen Linnea; his mother, Mrs. Alice Houser of Prattville, Alabama; two sisters, Mrs. Frances Busby and Mrs. Earlene Brown; three brothers, Mr. Mack Morris Houser, Mr. William Houser, and Mr. Louis Houser, all of Alabama; a devoted cousin, Mrs. Lena Fletcher of Washington, D.C.; father-in-law, Mr. Luther Stuckey of Indian Head, Maryland; four sisters-in-law; five brothers-in-law; a host of relatives and many, many friends.●

A TRIBUTE TO DR. BENJAMIN MAYS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, great men die, but their legacies live forever. It is with great sorrow that I acknowledge the death of one of the greatest black Americans of the 20th century—Dr. Benjamin E. Mays. Fortunately, I am heartened to know that his legacy and teachings will live for generations to come.

Born in Epworth, S.C., in 1894, Dr. Mays received a B.A. degree from Bates College, Lewiston, Maine, in 1920 and an M.A. degree (1925) and Ph. D. degree (1935) from the University of Chicago. Dr. Mays held teaching positions at Moorehouse College and South Carolina State College from 1920 to 1926. He served as dean of the school of religion at Howard University from 1934 to 1940 and as president of Moorehouse College from 1940 to 1968. Dr. Mays also served on the Atlanta Board of Education and as its chairman from 1970 to 1981.

As an educator, administrator, and spiritual leader, Dr. Mays shaped the minds of many of our Nation's black leaders, most notable: Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., Mayor Andrew Young of Atlanta, and Georgia State Senator Julian Bond.

As one who shied from the limelight and publicity, Dr. Mays was one of the more influential strategist of the civil rights movement. A man gifted with immense patience and unyielding fortitude, Dr. Mays always stressed, "Making Friends of One's Enemies."

As the recipient of countless awards and honors, Dr. Mays also authored seven books including, "Born to Rebel," a study which covers 75 years of black-white relations in the United States. He served on the boards of several colleges and universities as well as the Martin Luther King Center for Social Change.

America will miss the likes of this great man. However, again, I am confident that his legacy will live through the countless lives that he has touched.●

A DYNAMIC LEADER

HON. MARY ROSE OAKAR

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, our Nation's and region's future depends on dynamic leadership in areas related to employment and training. The following is an article which demonstrates a dynamic leader.

CCC CHIEF HAS HIGH HOPES FOR JOB CENTER

(By John Leo Koshar)

Nolen M. Ellison, president of Cuyahoga Community College, spent a year working with a national task force of the American Association of Community and Junior Colleges (AACJC) on how to put America back to work.

"Now that program is coming to fruition here in line with Gov. (Richard F.) Celeste's plan for strategic planning to develop jobs," Ellison said in an interview recently.

Ellison was referring to Celeste's announcement earlier this month of the release of $8.5 million to build a Unified Technologies Center on the CCC Metro Campus.

Ground breaking is scheduled for June and Ellison said it could be fully operational by fall 1986.

Previous announcements have indicated the center will have the capacity to train or retrain 1,400 people annually in high growth industries and for changing technologies.

"We will work with business and industry to define and describe what kind of training and retraining they think they will need to obtain employment," he said.

That, he indicated, will determine the size of the student body.

"An advisory committee of industry people will help shape the curriculum," he said. "They will advise what kind of program is needed for training and retraining. We will work directly with business and industry. That will be the strength of this program and will make it unique."

He said that 39 of the top corporate chief executives that are part of the Cleveland Tomorrow campaign are working with the college to develop a technical training program that relates to state-of-the -art manufacturing opportunities.

"The keynote of the center will be flexibility and responsiveness to the needs of business and industry," said Ellison. "The object is to bring about a strong match between the needs of business and industry and the people we will turn out."

Ellison said college officials also are talking to Ford Motor Co., which operates a program of training people that might come back to the company in computer technology and other skills and to equip those people Ford cannot keep with skills for jobs elsewhere.

He said Dr. Ron Zambetti, provost of the Urban Metropolitan Development Institute, visited Ford's training facility in Nashville, Tenn., recently to help determine how to organize the CCC center. The institute is the outreach arm of CCC responsible for development of the center.

CCC also is working with Technicare Corp. to develop tailor-made courses designed for its specific occupational needs, such as in computer repair and other areas.

Ellison said it is very difficult to guarantee 100% job placement for the center's trainees. He emphasized that ". . . we are going to try to close the gap between training and placement and make that gap as narrow as possible because the people who will be trained or retrained need to feel they are being trained for jobs that exist and not just to be trained as an end in itself."

He said the center would contain a resource support system for small businesses that should have a tremendous impact on this group.

The business community will be involved not only in helping to develop the curriculum but in selecting the chief executive officer for the center and its staff, said Ellison.

"We think staffing will have some unique characteristics. We will seek some of the top people in business and industry to get skilled craftsmen brought into our teaching and training corps.

"We will look for industry-experienced people with less theory and more application."

The center will be designed to provide work-force education and training in modern, applied high technologies through hands-on use of industry-specific equipment, machinery and laboratories.

Training and retraining will be for jobs in high growth industries such as energy and instrumentation technologies and electronic and mechanical technologies.

More than 26,000 square feet of the 96,000-square-foot facility will be devoted to applied skills training for private industry.

Lecture and laboratory instruction will include energy and instrumentation technologies with courses such as solar energy, fuel cells, helium gas turbines, fusions, metrology and computerized energy monitoring.

Instruction in electronic technologies will encompass courses in microcomputer hardware, microprocessor technologies, satellites, video discs, videotex, optical fibers and laser technology.

Mechanical technologies will focus on machining in industry, especially computer-assisted manufacturing, machine maintenance and repair and tool-and-die training.

It also will include metal fabrication, welding production, plastics, electromechanical-fluidal-thermalpneumatics training and robotization in manufacturing allied health applications.

Trainees will have full use of the Metro Campus services, such as career planning and placement.

"We will not necessarily link their (the students) training to college degrees, but we hope to be able to link credit and noncredit opportunities," Ellison said.

He said the center would be run on a 12-month program basis and he hopes that contracts with businesses and industries will help pay for the larger part of the tuitions.

Class scheduling specifications call for offering four different options: accelerated full-time (eight hours per day, three days per week); regular full-time (four hours per day, five days per week); limited full-time (eight hours per day, two days per week); part-time (three hours per evening, four evenings per week).●

TRIBUTE TO "UNIONIST OF THE YEAR": JOHN BIGELOW

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, on March 30th, the Central Labor Council of Alameda County, AFL-CIO, honored John Bigelow as "Unionist of the Year."

Mr. Bigelow is being recognized for his untiring efforts on behalf of the labor movement and for his many civic contributions.

In 1939, John Bigelow joined his first union, local 1114, which is now the Amalgamated Transit Union, while working for Greyhound bus lines. He left there to join the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners Local 2116 in 1941. Transferring from that local to Carpenters 554, he worked in the shipyards until August 1943, when he joined the merchant marine. He sailed first as a marine cook and steward, then as a member of the SUP on six ships. On four of them, he was ship's delegate for the deck gang (shop steward).

When he left the sea in January 1946, John went to work for the American Can Co., where he joined the United Steel Workers Union, Local 1798. He was vice president of that union from 1947-49. When the Steelworkers issued a new charter for the American Can plant, Bigelow became a charter member of that local and served as its chief steward for 12 years.

When John Bigelow joined the Ashland fire department in 1961, there were no organized firefighters south or east of San Leandro. Shortly after his arrival, he helped organize and get a charter from the International Association of Firefighters. He was the local's first president and served 8 years in that capacity. On retiring in 1977, he was honored by receiving the first lifetime membership ever awarded by that membership. John's leadership in organizing the firefighters in Ashland not only provided benefits to his fellow employees, but he was instrumental in establishing charters in many other surrounding cities in Alameda County.

Very early in his union activity, John recognized the importance of labor councils. He was a delegate to the CIO Council from 1946 until the merger of the two councils, becoming a charter member of the present Central Labor Council of Alameda County AFL-CIO, serving as a delegate until the present.

Mr. Speaker, I have given you an outline of the involvement that John Bigelow has had with the labor movement. But think of what that outline implies. John has put in unending hours of devotion and hard work, after a full day on the job, trying to better the lot of the workingman. I think that he has a record to be proud of.

I join John Bigelow's friends in expressing appreciation for his dedication and hard work in the labor movement. John's loyalty to his friends and his activities on behalf of COPE will be long remembered.●

SOUTH AFRICA

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, the following op-ed piece by long-time member of the liberal opposition party in South Africa, Helen Suzman, I believe accurately assesses U.S. efforts toward achieving our stated policy goal in South Africa—the nonviolent change of that Government from active support of apartheid to democracy and political freedom.

Ms. Suzman is a leading spokesperson for her party in the South African Parliament, and I recommend that my colleagues read it.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 29, 1984]

WHAT CAN AMERICA DO?

SOME PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS FOR DEALING WITH SOUTH AFRICA

CAPE TOWN.—The question I am most frequently asked when I visit the United States is, "What can America do about South Africa?" The answer depends on the motivation that prompted it—whether it was based on moral, punitive or reform aims.

Superpatriots, who abound in South Africa, have no problem in replying to the question, of course. Their answer is that the United States should mind its own business; that is has no right to interfere in South Africa's domestic affairs; that there are double standards, since many countries practice policies much more oppressive than those in South Africa yet escape the strong condemnation meted out to South Africa.

True enough. But a country that claims to have the values of Western democracy must expect to be judged by these criteria. Moreover, the unique brand of race discrimination entrenched in law in South Africa is a convincing justification for double standards. Of course, self-interest, such as U.S. trade with black Africa and the reactions of the black constituency at home, as well as genuine concern for human rights, motivates politicians and others in the United States in their attitudes to South Africa: opposing apartheid provides one of these rare occurences in politics where expediency coincides with a just cause.

There is a simple course of action that advocates disengagement from any form of association with South Africa—be it in trade, investment, academe, the arts or sport—the "clean hands doctrine." This relieves the conscience, but it also dilutes any influence over future events.

Punitive actions can sometimes be counterproductive, such as the mandatory arms embargo imposed on South Africa by the U.N. Security Council in 1977, which led to South Africa's developing a highly efficient arms industry.

In one instance certainly, however, punitive action has resulted in a fundamental change in policy in South Africa. The total ban from all international sports forced South Africa to desegregate sports, not only on the field but also in clubs and facilities for spectators. And to the intense bitterness of white South Africans, there has been no letup of the sports boycott. The ante has been upped.

Where the demands were originally confined to the removal of apartheid in sports itself—that is, to "normalize" sports—they have been systematically extended to demanding the removal of race discrimination in its entirety, under the slogan "no normal sport in an abnormal society." The Gleneagles Commonwealth agreement prohibiting sport with South Africa remains in force. South Africa's flag will not fly at the Los Angeles Olympics.

The carrot or the stick? Both have been tried by U.S. administrations. The Carter regime used the stick—with minimal results. The Reagan administration is trying the carrot, otherwise known as "constructive engagement," until recently without conspicuous success. At long last, the major prize, an internationally acceptable settlement of the Namibian issue, now seems less elusive. And the U.S. role as honest broker must have played a part in the peace move taking place between South Africa and Angola and South Africa and Mozambique.

"Quiet diplomacy," however, has not deterred Pretoria from its grand apartheid policy. Outside the State Department, other efforts are being mounted in the United States to impel change in South Africa. The divestment campaign has heated up. Several state and city legislatures have adopted or are considering measures to force divestment of U.S. companies conducting business in or with South Africa, either by prohibiting investment of their pension funds or selling their stocks in such companies. But unless such a campaign can be successfully conducted on a universal scale, which is highly unlikely, it is of symbolic significance only.

The recent amendments to the Export Administration Act were passed by Congress in October 1983, if approved by the House-Senate conference, could be more damaging. If reform is the objective it is not likely to be effective, however. Solarz is reported to have stated that his objective was "to send a strong signal" to the regime in Pretoria. Chances are that the signal will be received with the well-known acknowledgment: "Roger—and out."

The truth is that the capacity of the United States to influence change in South Africa is limited. And this has to be accepted if reform is the objective of those who pose the question, "What can the United States do about South Africa?"

The changes that have taken place in South Africa cannot be attributed either to the carrot or the stick, although international pressures do play a part in accelerating the process. The determining factor has been—and, I am convinced, will continue to be—economic pressure from within South Africa—the steady upward movement into skilled occupations by blacks, eventually giving blacks the muscle with which to make demands for shifts in power and privilege, backed up by the force of black urbanization, which continues inexorably despite government action to stem it.

These are the factors that have induced Pretoria to vote more money for black education and training, to repeal the law that reserved skilled industrial jobs for whites. These are the factors that have forced the South African government to recognize black trade unions and the permanency of blacks in the cities. And although blacks in South Africa react with enthusiasm to all suggestions of punitive action against South Africa, including divestment (which some support because they identify capitalism with apartheid and want the whole system brought down), in fact, if black economic advancement is inadvertently retarded thereby, they will be the ultimate losers.

Despite the limitations that exist, I believe that America has a role to play in South Africa. The United States should certainly make known in no uncertain fashion its disapproval of the more repulsive aspects of apartheid—the forced removal of blacks into poverty-stricken rural areas, pass-law arrests and the more glaring abrogations of civil rights—detention without trial, and banning. It is unthinkable that the most powerful democracy in the world, whose fundamental values are based on the protection of human rights, should abdicate its responsibility in this regard.

And the U.S government should use leverage wherever possible to lend weight to the hope it expressed after the recent referendum in South Africa that the mandate received by the government would be used "to address the problem of the political rights of South Africa's black majority."●

SOCIAL SECURITY REVIEW PROCEDURES

HON. STAN LUNDINE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, the bureaucratic nightmare caused by the Social Security Administration's overzealous tightening of eligibility review procedures for social security disability insurance has been well documented in the testimony of scores of witnesses, including those disabled by various illnesses and those who serve their needs through State, county, and local helping organizations.

The passage of the Social Security Disability Benefits Reform Act which clarifies eligibility standards and reforms the review procedures for determining continued eligibility for disability insurance is absolutely critical to redress some of the hardships caused by the Social Security Administration's strict and inflexible enforcement of review procedures.

Nevertheless, some disabled persons and their families whose insurance has been terminated will not be fortunate enough to receive the humanitarian benefits of new legislation. Such a case has recently come to light in my own congressional district, and is reported on the front page of the March 29, 1984, issue of the Buffalo Evening News. The text of the report follows:

BUREAUCRATIC COMPASSION DENIED EVEN IN DEATH

(By Douglas Turner)

WASHINGTON.—A few weeks ago Linda Clark of the small Cattaraugus County town of Hinsdale offered the ultimate proof to the Social Security Administration about her disability claim. She died at age 34 of the ailment she said all along was making her unable to work—juvenile diabetes.

In spite of that, her husband, James, laid off since last fall, was told in the past few days that he can't have a survivor's benefit to help defray her burial costs.

The reason is that the Social Security Administration is still demanding payment of $2,018 it claims it sent Mrs. Clark while she was technically ineligible for disability pay.

The Clark's situation points up an administrative nightmare created by Congress and the Carter administration, which is still being continued by the Reagan government.

A bill overwhelmingly passed Tuesday by the House is designed to liberalize and clarify procedures in the disability program administered by Social Security.

Opposed by the White House, a companion measure faces an uncertain future in the Senate.

In 1980, Congress passed a law requiring the agency to review the disability rolls to determine whether any who were receiving allowances were able to work.

Although the harsh measures the agency took to comply with the law were criticized in Congress by liberals and conservatives alike, the paring of the rolls continued unabated.

Last November, Mrs. Clark was notified that her benefits would be terminated. Under a moratorium passed by Congress earlier in the year, her benefits continued through the appeal process.

They consisted $409 a month plus Medicare coverage.

As a result of the diabetes, Mrs. Clark developed heart trouble, swelling of the limbs and progressive blindness. She was diagnosed a diabetic at age 3.

Under present law, the Social Security Administration can disallow disability if it finds that any one ailment is insufficient in itself to cause disability. The law does not require it to consider a combination of ailments that contributes to disability.

In Mrs. Clark's case, the agency followed the letter of the law.

Her denial of benefits was upheld by a state agency, by F. Lambert Haley, an administrative law judge in Buffalo, and by a Social Security appeals council here.

An aide to Rep. Stanley N. Lundine, D-Jamestown, said that because the Clarks could not afford a lawyer, they had to be represented in the Buffalo hearing by a lay advocate. The aide, Elisabeth Johnson, said new rules of the Legal Services Corporation, a federal agency, bar any of its lawyers representing a claimant before a federal agency.

Mrs. Clark had been receiving disability payments since 1979. That was about the time Mrs. Clark had to begin periodic laser treatments to stem the hemorrhaging of her retinas, the part of the eye that senses light.

She also was beginning to develop serious trouble with her kidneys.

Mr. Clark said his wife received notice of the SSA rejection of her appeal Feb. 9, and she had her first heart attack Feb. 15.

He said he believes that the denial of benefits led directly to the heart attack.

"For the last two months my wife talked suicide," he said Wednesday. "She was passing out all the time, and getting sick a lot.

"She couldn't work and wanted to do her share. And all she had to look forward to was two or three years in federal court (fighting for an appeal to overturn the ruling), and nobody knows what would have come of that."

The death certificate said Mrs. Clark died Feb. 27 of a massive heart attack, brought on by circulatory problems and kidney failure. These, in turn, the certificate said, were caused by diabetes that she had been suffering from.

The certificate said she had been ill with the circulatory and kidney problems for at least three years

An autopsy performed on Mrs. Clark was the basis of the findings outlined in the death certificate. It said her coronary arteries were severely hardened and diseased, and all four chambers of her heart were dilated.

Not long after Mrs. Clark was permanently removed from the disability rolls, John Svehn, the head of the Social Security Administration, notified her that she had 30 days to repay the government $2,018.

That was the amount the government paid her between the time it notified her she was to be dropped and the denial of her appeal.

Mr. Clark filed for a waiver of the repayment, claiming hardship. He has been on unemployment insurance benefits for 20 weeks. Social Security hasn't responded to his waiver request.

A few days ago, he went to the Olean Social Security office to apply for survivor's benefits to help pay for the $2,500 funeral for his wife. He was told he can't receive those benefits until he pays the government $2,018.

Besides the burial costs, Mr. Clark still is facing $8,000 in hospital and doctors' bills. The hearing process stripped Mrs. Clark of her Medicare benefits.

The bill passed by the House would probably have spared the Clarks the pain they experienced because of the denial of disability and the hearings that followed over the past few months. The legislation, Rep. Lundine said, would provide "that the combined effects of all impairments be considered when an individual is judged for eligibility for disability payments."

Rep. Lundine's office said the congressman would press SSA for a waiver of the $2,018 it wanted back.

About a week after Mrs. Clark died, her husband said, he received a notice from the New York State Commission for the Blind and Visually Handicapped.

The commission, not knowing what the Social Security Administration had done and that Mrs. Clark had died, certified that she was legally blind and eligible for training and other help.●

CONSTRUCTIVE ENGAGEMENT WORKS

HON. BILL CHAPPELL, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Speaker, the Congress has been rightfully concerned over the past few years with events in southern Africa. One of the principal foreign policy objectives of the United States has been an end to mutual interference by the nations of that area in one another's affairs.

It would appear, as described in an article in the Washington Post, Tuesday, March 20, by the columnist Joseph Kraft, that the United States has been constructively engaged in the peace process in sourthern Africa. This process will be a long one as we have seen in some other parts of the world, and the agreement signed between Mozambique and South Africa is just another step along the way. But those of us who really want to see the journey through to a happy end should applaud this step.

Mr. Speaker, I submit the referenced article for insertion in the RECORD at this point:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 20, 1984]

TURNING POINT IN AFRICA

(By Joseph Kraft)

Southern Africa provides the most striking foreign policy gain so far achieved in the Reagan administration. For the recent accord between Mozambique and South Africa marks a historic step toward the safe dismantling of the most explosive racial powder keg in the world.

The United States played a modest role in that accord, and it is instructive to examine just how. For success came from containing this country's favorite diplomatic itches—preaching human rights and reviling Marxist regimes.

Two turnarounds entered into the treaty signed Friday between Prime Minister P. W. Botha of South Africa and President Samora Machel of Mozambique. For a half-dozen years South Africa, under Botha, has defended its racist practices by a badneighbor policy. South African forces made savage attacks on the ground and by air deep into the territory of neighboring black states. The South Africans also sponsored native dissident movements that played on tribal divisions to the point of chaos in Mozambique, Angola, Zimbabwe and Lesotho.

Military elements inside the South African regime favored an indefinite dose of that harsh medicine. A slightly more moderate group under Foreign Minister Pik Botha argued in favor of striking deals with the neighboring black states. American diplomacy supported the approach of the foreign minister and helped persuade the prime minister to go for a negotiated settlement.

A main reason the United States enjoyed influence in Pretoria is that the Reagan administration ceased treating South Africa's grossly racist apartheid policy as a barrier to any dealings. The United States developed instead a policy of "constructive engagement." It vetoed a couple of United Nations resolutions that would have imposed sanctions on Pretoria. It congratulated the Botha regime on a constitutional change that eased restrictions on people of mixed blood, though not on blacks. While outspokenly critical of apartheid, Assistant Secretary of State Chester Crocker indicated Washington wanted to help South Africa ease racial tensions. So this country had a hearing when it urged the Botha government to make terms with Mozambique.

An exactly contrary policy had to be turned around in Mozambique. Ever since the mid-'60s black regimes in Africa believed that the ending of white power throughout the continent was written in the stars. The "winds of change" and the "wave of the future," it was said, would slowly force the whites to get out. The point seemed proved in 1980 when white rule collapsed in Rhodesia and blacks took over what has become Zimbabwe.

So black regimes in Africa settled down to a long drawn-out struggle against the racist government of South Africa. Black leaders eschewed ties with Pretoria. They backed groups, notably the African National Congress, dedicated to the "liberation" of South Africa. Rather than accept help from states friendly to South Africa they turned to Russia and her allies. Thus President Machel fastened a Marxist regime on Mozambique. In Angola, the Marxist government came to rely on Cubans for protection against dissidents backed by South Africa.

These regimes were badly weakened by South African terror tactics, and by internal dissidents. On top of that, the 1980–82 recession cut income from raw material exports, and drought made matters worse. Still, Marxist leaders were loath to come to terms with South Africa. There again, U.S. diplomacy played a role in urging talks between black states of the area and Pretoria.

But how come the United States, having done business with Pretoria, carried weight with black leaders? The answer is that American diplomats, under the Reagan administration, did not act as though Marxism was the pitch that defiled. They have dealt extensively with the regime in Angola. Similarly with Machel of Mozambique. Indeed, even after being nudged to the conference table with South Africa, Machel stuck to his Marxist guns. In signing the accord, he spoke anew of the "differences between our social, political and economic concepts."

The agreement between Mozambique and South Africa is basically a non-aggression pact. It provides that both countries keep peace on the frontier and refrain from supporting groups hostile to the other. It can thus be generalized to cover relations between South Africa and all its neighbors.

An indent for a similar deal has already been made—thanks very largely to American influence—between South Africa and Angola. A temporary cease-fire and disengagement are in effect, with mixed teams supervising the agreement. If the accord sticks, Namibia, a territory illegally occupied by South Africa, would gain independence. Angola would invite the Cubans out. South Africa would restrain the UNITA movement of Angolan dissidents under Jonas Savimbi.

Even such an agreement, which now looks to be in prospect, is just another step along the way. The African time bomb will be defused only when a more humane regime is established in South Africa itself. But the steps along the way show the conditions for a constructive American role. This country can be helpful only when it ceases to force on others the human rights standards of the American left and the ideological preferences of the American right.

Mr. Speaker, in preparing to submit the above article by Joseph Kraft, I noticed in the Post's March 22 issue, an article by Helen Suzman, a distinguished and leading liberal in the South African Parliament. Her credentials have never been questioned even by the strongest critics of the South African Government, perhaps, because she has established the reputation of being a very strong critic herself. Her article deals in a measured and reasoned way with the relations between the United States and South Africa. With the hope that all my colleagues who share a concern for this relationship might read it most carefully, it is submitted for placement in the RECORD at this point:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 22, 1984

WHAT CAN AMERICA DO?

(By Helen Suzman)

CAPE TOWN.—The question I am most frequently asked when I visit the United States is, "What can America do about South Africa?" The answer depends on the motivation that prompted it—whether it was based on moral, punitive or reform aims.

Superpatriots, who abound in South Africa, have no problem in replying to the question, of course. Their answer is that the United States should mind its own business; that it has no right to interfere in South Africa's domestic affairs; that there are double standards, since many countries practice policies such more oppressive than those in South Africa yet escape the strong condemnation meted out to South Africa.

True enough. But a country that claims to have the values of Western democracy must expect to be judged by these criteria. Moreover, the unique brand of race discrimination entrenched in law in South Africa is a convincing justification for double standards. Of course, self-interest, such as U.S. trade with black Africa and the reactions of the black constituency at home, as well as genuine concern for human rights, motivates politicians and others in the United States in their attitudes to South Africa: opposing apartheid provides one of these rare occurrences in politics where expediency coincides with a just cause.

There is a simple appeal in the course of action that advocates disengagement from any form of association with South Africa—be it in trade, investment, academe, the arts or sport—the "clean hands doctrine." This relieves the conscience, but it also dilutes any influence over future events.

Punitive actions can sometimes be counterproductive, such as the mandatory arms embargo imposed on South Africa by the U.N. Security Council in 1977, which led to South Africa's developing a highly efficient arms industry.

In one instance certainly, however, punitive action has resulted in a fundamental change in policy in South Africa. The total ban from all international sports forced South Africa to desegregate sports, not only on the field but also in clubs and facilities for spectators. And to the intense bitterness of white South Africans, there has been no let-up of the sports boycott. The ante has been upped.

Where the demands were originally confined to the removal of apartheid in sports itself—that is, to "normalize" sports—they have been systematically extended to demanding the removal of race discrimination in its entirely, under the slogan "no normal sport in an abnormal society." The Gleneagles Commonwealth agreement prohibiting sport with South Africa remains in force. South Africa's flag will not fly at the Los Angeles Olympics.

The carrot or the stick? Both have been tried by U.S. administrations. The Carter regime used the stick—with minimal results. The Reagan administration is trying the carrot, otherwise known as "constructive engagement," until recently without conspicuous success. At long last, the major prize, an internationally acceptable settlement of the Namibian issue, now seems less elusive. And the U.S. role as honest broker must have played a part in the peace move taking place between South Africa and Angola and South Africa and Mozambique.

"Quiet diplomacy," however, has not deterred Pretoria from its grand apartheid policy. Outside the State Department, other efforts are being mounted in the United States to impel change in South Africa. The divestment campaign has heated up. Several state and city legislatures have adopted or are considering measures to force divestment of U.S. companies conducting business in or with South Africa, either by prohibiting investment of their pension funds or selling their stocks in such companies. But unless such a campaign can be successfully conducted on a universal scale, which is highly unlikely, it is of symbolic significance only.

The recent amendments to the Export Administration Act proposed by Reps. Stephen Solarz, Howard L. Berman and William H. Gray, which were passed by Congress in October 1983, if approved by the House-Senate conference, could be more damaging. If reform is the objective it is not likely to be effective, however. Solarz is reported to have stated that his objective was "to send a strong signal" to the regime in Pretoria. Chances are that the signal will be received with the well-known acknowledgment: "Roger—and out."

The truth is that the capacity of the United States to influence change in South Africa is limited. And this has to be accepted if reform is the objective of those who pose the question, "What can the United States do about South Africa?"

The changes that have taken place in South Africa cannot be attributed either to the carrot or the stick, although international pressures do play a part in accelerating the process. The determining factor has been—and, I am convinced, will continue to be—economic pressure from within South Africa—the steady upward movement into skilled occupations by blacks, eventually giving blacks the muscle with which to make demands for shifts in power and privilege, backed up by the force of black urbanization, which continues inexorably despite government action to stem it.

These are the factors that have induced Pretoria to vote more money for black education and training, to repeal the law that reserved skilled industrial jobs for whites. These are the factors that have forced the South African government to recognize black trade unions and the permanency of blacks in the cities. And although blacks in South Africa react with enthusiasm to all suggestions of punitive action against South Africa, including divestment (which some support because they identify capitalism with apartheid and want the whole system brought down), in fact, if black economic advancement is inadvertently retarded thereby, they will be the ultimate losers.

Despite the limitations that exist, I believe that America has a role to play in South Africa. The United States should certainly make known in no uncertain fashion its disapproval of the more repulsive aspects of apartheid—the forced removal of blacks into poverty-stricken rural areas, pass-law arrests and the more glaring abrogations of civil rights—detention without trial, and banning. It is unthinkable that the most powerful democracy in the world, whose fundamental values are based on the protection of human rights should abdicate its responsibility in this regard.

And the U.S. government should use leverage wherever possible to lend weight to the hope it expressed after the recent referendum in South Africa that the mandate received by the government would be used "to address the problem of the political rights of South Africa's black majority."●

LET US PULL THE PLUG ON PAC-MEN

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, as Members of Congress, we have all witnessed the alarming growth in the number of political action committees over the last decade. As campaign costs continue to skyrocket, more and more of our colleagues are becoming dependent on PAC contributions to finance their reelection efforts. So much so, that today, nearly 70 percent receive PAC contributions.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the tremendous impact PAC's have on congressional elections is the most insidious influence on American government confronting us today. In many cases, only a very fine line draws the distinction between a legitimate campaign contribution and a bribe. If this great Nation of ours is to continue to follow the ideal of one-person, one-vote, this perilous influence must be stemmed.

I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues, an excellent essay on this subject that appeared recently in the New York Times, written by Philip M. Stern. Mr. Stern is the cochairman of Citizens Against PAC's, a bipartisan coalition dedicated to removing the exorbitant influence of PAC's on American government. I recommend this as required reading for all my colleagues and urge them to support H.R. 4428, the Congressional Campaign Finance Act, introduced by my friend and colleague from Wisconson, DAVID OBEY. While it is not the final solution—only public financing will solve the inherent problems with our present system—this legislation would start to bring about the needed changes in our congressional campaign financing system and help preserve the ideals of representative government.

The essay follows:

[From the New York Times, Mar. 13, 1984]

PRONOUNCE PAC's "POX"

(By Philip M. Stern)

WASHINGTON.—When Congress passed a law in 1974 requiring political candidates to disclose the sources of their campaign money, many citizens rejoiced. At long last, this murky area would be bathed in sunshine; the voters' wisdom would cleanse the system. But the murk remains.

How many voters really know where their elected representatives get their campaign money and to whom they are politically indebted?

How many, say, in Peoria, Ill., are aware that their Congressman, Robert H. Michel, and House Republican leader, got two-thirds of his 1982 campaign money not from his own constituents but from outside political-action committees that have no connection with his district—for example, from the Ocean Spray (cranberry) PAC, based in Plymouth, Mass.; the Long Island Aerospace PAC, of Baldwin, N.Y.; the Antelope Valley PAC, in Palmdale, Calif.

Consider Chicago's Dan Rostenkowski, chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, safely ensconced in a lopsidedly Democratic district. How many of his constituents know that he began his 1982 campaign with $224,000 in his campaign treasury, yet raised an additional $519,000, more than half of it from PAC's, and ended up with a campaign surplus of nearly half a million dollars, which he can legally transfer to his own bank account when he leaves Congress? (Under law, Congressmen elected after January 1980 may no longer do that.)

How many Knoxville, Tenn., voters know that in 1982, their Representative, John J. Duncan, a Republican, raised $200,000 in campaign funds—57 percent of it from outside PAC's—even though he ran unopposed?

If most voters are in the dark about these practices, that's understandable, for the facts and figures candidates report to the Federal Election Commission, in Washington, are hard to come by back home.

The PAC system corrodes representative democracy. When legislators like Mr. Michel—he is far from unique—get two-thirds of their campaign money from groups that neither live nor vote in their districts, whom do they really represent? Mr. Michel attributes the "wide variety" of his 1982 contributions to the "symbolic importance" of his role as House Republican leader, and says that he has "not reviewed the reports thoroughly enough to know who contributed and who didn't."

Just one month after Representative Mickey Edwards, Republican of Oklahoma, got a $2,500 contribution from the National Automobile Dealers Association, he co-sponsored a measure, strongly favored by the dealers, to kill a rule requiring dealers to tell customers about major defects in used cars they sell. Later, after his vote helped kill the rule, that PAC gave him $2,000 more. But if every person's vote counted equally in Congressmen's reckoning, why would two-thirds of them side with the few auto dealers and against the thousands of auto buyers in their districts? The answer seems to be: To office-holders and candidates hungry for campaign funds, PAC money talks louder than votes.

In Maryland, Representative Roy Dyson, a Democrat, who has no auto plants in his district, got $16,650 in campaign gifts from the United Automobile Workers' PAC. He voted for a bill, strongly backed by the U.A.W., that would save auto workers' jobs in other districts by requiring American-made parts in imported cars. He cast that vote despite Congressional Budget Office warnings that the measure would boost auto prices for all his constituents and would mean a net loss of American jobs.

While Messrs. Duncan, Dyson, Edwards and Rostenkowski failed to respond to inquiries from my organization about their actions, most Congressmen indignantly protest that their votes are not for sale. But that sidesteps the real question: Are, say, Mr. Edwards and Mr. Dyson as free to vote against the wishes of the auto dealers and the U.A.W. as if they had taken none of their money?

Congressmen also deny a cause-and-effect connection between gifts and votes, arguing that the PAC's merely donate to candidates already philosophically attuned to them. Why, then, do one-third of all PAC's give almost entirely to incumbents, despite their widely varying ideologies?

As campaign costs skyrocket, more and more Congressmen become dependent on PAC money. In 1974, only 28 percent of House members got one-third of their money from PAC's outside their districts; today, nearly 70 percent are thus reliant on PAC's. Since only a saint would deny some favored attention to these major contributors, that means shortchanging the many voters who can't afford large—or any—campaign gifts. It hardly adds up to one-person, one-vote democracy.●

VOTE EXPLANATION OF CONGRESSMAN SOLOMON

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, March 29, the House voted on House Resolution 443 (Rollcall No. 59). This resolution provides nearly $500,000 in funding for the newly constituted Select Committee on Hunger. Had I been present at the time the vote occurred on House Resolution 443, I would have voted against the resolution.

The Select Committee on Hunger was created on February 22, 1984, through the passage of House Resolution 15. I voted in favor of the resolution at that time because we were informed that the creation of this new select committee would result in no additional outlays, that no new staff would be required because other existing committees would share staff with the newly formed select committee. Obviously, this is not the case, and this House has once again continued down the path toward an ever-increasing congressional bureaucracy. I regret that I was not present to vote against the funding resolution, and I regret that I relied upon the representations made during the debate on House Resolution 15. I should have known better than to believe this House would pass up the opportunity to create yet another committee fiefdom.●

RECORD FEDERAL DEFICITS, RISING INTEREST RATES, EMPLOYMENT, CRIME, AND U.S. ROLE IN WORLD—GREATEST CONCERN OF THE PEOPLE OF THE EIGHTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF NEW JERSEY

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 2, 1984

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, our Nation's current record-high Federal deficit, which may total $220 billion this year, is a matter of great concern to all Americans. There is a great fear throughout the land that those deficits will spur a new round of inflation to erode our paychecks and bring a halt to any hopes for a sustained economic recovery.

The danger of continued record Federal deficits is very much on the minds of the residents of the Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey. The results of my recent congressional legislative questionnaire show that an overwhelming 92 percent of those responding see Federal deficit spending as the most critical economic problem facing our Nation.

The administration's staggering request for $1.9 trillion over the next 5 years for military programs was strongly viewed as a key culprit in the deficit spending by more than 85 percent of the respondents.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the Eighth District of New Jersey are willing to do their part to reduce the Federal deficit. They have shown the determination and willingness to "bite the bullet" to help America bring the deficit situation under control.

Some 69 percent of those answering the questionnaire stated they supported the passage of a constitutional amendment requiring Congress to pass a balanced Federal budget.

Mr. Speaker, like my constituents, I believe it is essential we adopt balanced budgets in order to safeguard our Nation's economic health. It is for that reason that I have consistently supported and voted in favor of the budget resolutions that were based upon realistic economic assumptions. During the last Congress I voted in favor of a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. As we are all aware, it is the White House that submits the budget to Congress. While there is nothing in the law now to prevent the White House from submitting a balanced budget to Congress for consideration, this has not been the case. In fact, the fiscal year 1985 budget submitted by the White House contained more than $180 billion in deficit spending.

The people of the Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey are deeply concerned about other key areas affecting the economic viability of our Nation. The questionnaire's results showed that 89 percent of the respondents were very concerned over continuing high unemployment rates, while 82 percent shared worries over new rounds of inflation and high interest rates.

Mr. Speaker, the people of my congressional district have spoken out loud and clear about their concern for cleaning up the environment of our Nation. They emphatically stated, by an overwhelming 91 percent response to the questionnaire, of the need for priority funds to clean up our air and water pollution. They expressed strong dissatisfaction with the fact that only $4 billion of the nearly $900 billion Federal budget had been allocated to clean up the environment.

In the area of foreign affairs, the residents of my congressional district believe it is time for our allies to play a greater role in world matters. More than 90 percent of the respondents believe the White House should insist that our allies in Europe and around the world bear more of the cost of our mutual defense programs.

There is also strong support, with 67 percent responding affirmatively, for President Reagan's approach of placing new nuclear weapons in Western Europe as a method of forcing the Soviet Union to deal more seriously with arms control. The questionnaire also shows mixed feelings over our Nation's response to the downing of a Korean civilian airliner by the Russians. Some 55 percent felt the response was not strong enough, while 40 percent felt our reaction was adequate.

Mr. Speaker, the question of what to do about crime in the streets remains a great concern to the people of my congressional district. The past several years have witnessed the growth of a tough anticrime sentiment in New Jersey and around the Nation. That trend continued in my most recent questionnaire. In a question concerning the use of handguns, some 91 percent responded they would support stricter penalties for persons who use a firearm to commit a felony, over and above the penalty for the felony itself.

It is my firm belief that the congressional legislative questionnaire is a valuable constituent participation in determining the beliefs, attitudes, and desires of the people of our district, State, and Nation. I would like to offer my deepest thanks to the people of the Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey for their excellent response to my questionnaire. A full tabulation of the response I received to my questionnarie follows:

CONGRESSMAN ROE'S 8TH DISTRICT QUESTIONNAIRE

(Note.—Many district voters did not answer all items in the questionnaire and also those who voted "undecided" are not included in the percentiles of the answers.)

1. Do you favor the continued use of United States military forces in Lebanon to serve as part of an international peace keeping force there?—Yes 56; no 39.

2. The world was shocked by the downing of Korean Air Lines flight 007 by the Soviet Union, which resulted in the death of the plane's 269 passengers. Do you believe that the United States' response to that incident was strong enough?—Yes 40; no 55.

3. In light of the record high federal deficits forecast for the next several years, would you support a Constitutional Amendment requiring Congress to pass a balanced federal budget?—Yes 69; no 26.

4. The Reagan Administration wants to decontrol all natural gas by 1986, saying it will lead to increased supplies and reduced prices. Many others argue that supplies will fall and prices will rise if controls are lifted.

Do you think decontrol of natural gas is a good idea?—Yes 40; no 52.

6. Do you believe that the White House should insist that our allies in Europe and around the world bear more of the cost of our mutual defense programs?—Yes 91; no 6.

7. Do you support stricter penalties for persons who use a firearm to commit a felony, over and above the penalty for the felony itself?—Yes 91; no 5.

8. How high a priority would you put on cleaning up the nation's air and water in the federal budget? The current federal budget contains $854 billion of which only $4 billion has been allocated for clean air and water efforts. Do you believe that environmental matters should have:

(a) A greater share of the budget?—Yes 91.

(b) A lesser share?—Yes 59.

(c) About the same share as now?—Yes 83.

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

SENATE—Tuesday, April 3, 1984

(Legislative day of Monday, March 26, 1984)

The Senate met at 11 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Great God of truth and light, we thank Thee for the gift of speech. Words are the coin of the realm in this place. Millions of words have echoed through this Chamber and found their way to the printed page. Give to the word merchants who labor here continuing sensitivity to the influence of the spoken word. Help them to appreciate the power of words to inspire, to discourage, to console, to convict, to persuade, to alienate, to honor, to disparage, to encourage, to disappoint, to comfort, to embarrass, to edify, to offend, to strengthen, to weaken, to motivate, to immobilize, to give hope, to frustrate, to purify, to pollute, to build, to destroy. Thy word, O God, declares that "Death and life are in the power of the tongue." (Proverbs 18: 21) May we use this awesome power to bless and never curse. Help us to speak the truth in love. In the name of Him who was the word made flesh. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE ACTING MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The acting majority leader is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Chair.

SENATE SCHEDULE

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, today, after the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, special orders for the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE), the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI), and the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN), the Senate will have a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to extend beyond the hour of 12 noon, during which Senators may speak therein for not to exceed 2 minutes.

At 12 noon, the Senate will stand in recess until 2 p.m. for the regular weekly caucus and conference on each side of the aisle.

Mr. President, at 2 p.m. the Senate will resume consideration of the urgent supplemental agricultural appropriations measure, House Joint Resolution 492. The Kennedy amendment, which deals with the restriction on funds available for military assistance to the Government of El Salvador after May 31, 1984, is the pending amendment.

Mr. President, rollcalls are anticipated during the session of the Senate this afternoon and early evening. There is a possibility—as a matter of fact, a likelihood—of a late evening today.

The majority leader is attending a funeral this morning. This afternoon, he will confer with the minority leader and the managers of the bill to determine how long the Senate should stay in session today in order to make substantial progress on the joint resolution.

We would urge all Senators to reexamine the amendments they have filed. There are some 30 to 40 amendments still pending. If at all possible, we would like to finish consideration of this measure no later than Thursday evening and get to the reconciliation bill.

A PERIOD OF INCREASING WORLD TENSIONS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, we are in a period of increasing world tensions. In the Middle East, in Central America, in Africa, and in Europe we are faced with controversy and conflict. But the job of protecting America's interests abroad is becoming increasingly mired in disputes at home. This is perhaps a legacy of the unpopular Vietnam conflict, as is the War Powers Act that triggers much of our current debate over the use of military forces as a foreign policy instrument.

Free and open debate is a precious fundamental right in a free society. It is basic to American democracy and an essential part of our political process. But when that debate becomes too strident and leads to quick-fix legislative solutions it can undermine the consistency and the credibility of our efforts to establish effective policies abroad.

There are many who question the wisdom and even the constitutionality of the War Powers Act and the restraints it has imposed on the Chief Executive. But there are many others who would extend those restraints in order to modify or curb specific policy applications. The current debate over our policies in Central America is an example.

We are currently considering amendments to a supplemental appropriation measure that would forbid the President to introduce combat forces into any situation in Central America or even to conduct military training exercises in that region. These amendments would not only limit the President's options; they would impose major modifications on our foreign policy without even a modicum of committee review.

Other nations of the world must be starting to wonder if we really have a sustainable foreign policy under these circumstances. Perhaps it is time we took a step back and examined the impact some of these quick fixes might have on our role as a major world power.

Congress must continue to play a major role in the formulation of U.S. foreign policy. But it must be a responsible and reasoned role.

The Chief of Naval Operations, Adm. James D. Watkins, discussed the use of military power as a tool of foreign policy last week in an address to the Baltimore Council on Foreign Affairs and explored the impact of the War Powers Act. He has some provoking observations, and while I do not accept all his conclusions I believe his thoughts are worth this body's attention and consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Admiral Watkins' address of March 28 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUR CHOICE: NATIONAL POWER OR PARALYSIS

(By Adm. James D. Watkins)

Let me take you back 25 years to 1958, when President Dwight D. Eisenhower told a tense Nation he was sending 5,000 marines into Lebanon. Their mission—to preserve peace in the Middle East. His steps were tough, courageous, and successful. Peace was preserved without firing a single shot.

Just 4 years later, on the evening of October 22, 1962, President John F. Kennedy told us that the Soviets were preparing to introduce offensive, nuclear-tipped missiles into our hemisphere.

That was the beginning of a showdown between this Nation and the Soviet Union—the Cuban missile crisis. Again, an American President took quick steps to turn a crisis around, including the provocative step of implementing a strict naval quarantine on all offensive military equipment under shipment to Cuba.

These actions were summarized by President Kennedy, not with a threat, but with a promise—"any hostile move anywhere in the world against the safety and freedom of peoples to whom we are committed * * * will be met by whatever action is needed."

And again, aggressors understood the message. It was clear—we were standing ready to defend our national interests. They backed down and dismantled their missile sites in Cuba. Peace was preserved without firing a single shot.

In Lebanon in 1958, and off Cuba in 1962, we had the will power to stand tough. Proper use of diplomacy, fused with military power, stemmed each crisis. But would a belligerent nation believe us today? Could we take quick action and keep peace? Some students of government sincerely doubt it.

They say—at best, any similar action by a President today would cause full-scale debate, not only in Congress, but by armchair strategists as well, thereby dulling our reaction time. Our resolve would be doubted. Or at worst, we would fail to use military power effectively to carry out a mission of great urgency.

Why? Because something about us has changed they say; a metamorphosis occurred between the 1950's and the early 1980's. Over the past 30 years, we have all seen symptoms of this change.

First, there was Korea, then the pain of Vietnam. Later, we saw fellow citizens taken prisoner and humiliated in Iran, and a daily parade of media criticism which made it sound like we could not do anything right. There were plenty of symptoms of what appeared to be a terminal case of spirit loss.

Vietnam, more than any other single event, epitomized this change in America. The images of this conflict, from Kent State to Khe Sanh, flashed upon our TV screens each night and nauseated this country. We wondered what we were doing in that mess.

For us in the military, Vietnam was a confusing and ever-changing maze of rules of engagement and policy. The Vietnam conflict—which I would not even call a war because we lacked a national commitment to win—was like an exercise in how to fight by public opinion poll.

I can remember the time, when I was executive officer of the cruiser U.S.S. Long Beach, that we had to self-destruct one of our missiles aimed and fired at a North Vietnamese Mig aircraft, retiring back to Hanoi after raiding our forces in the south, because predicted missile intercept was slightly north of a certain Vietnamese parallel—an arbitrary political restriction. During the Vietnam conflict, political considerations here at home often dictated military operations to a debilitating extent.

So a creeping national malaise began to infect this Nation's spirit, drive and determination. Many individuals have questioned our self-worth, doubted our dignity, and with that, every American value we had always nourished and cherished. Some have rejected principles which worked for us in the past, which helped to make us great.

Rejected too was an important principle, one which had worked for us from our very beginnings. This was the principle which allowed a President to use military force judiciously in support of national policy and security.

This basic principle of our Constitution was clouded by passage of the War Powers Resolution of 1973. This resolution was caused by a long queue of events—starting with a hotly-contested, much-debated, "police action" in Korea—and culminating in the Vietnam experience.

But today, America has changed. We are on the move again. Our military strength, once decimated, is building anew. Our economy is improving, and people are going back to work. But most importantly, Americans are again feeling good about themselves and this great Nation.

Still, some symptoms of that era of defeat remain, causing us to falter a bit as we step forward. I see some symptoms remaining in areas close to my daily experience, as uniformed head of our navy, and a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Case in point—recently in Lebanon, we executed a mission called "presence." Presence is supposed to signal our interest in an area or a situation. But this signal was weakened by time limitations imposed under the War Powers Resolution. This influenced our military mission in Lebanon, and hampered our President from carrying out national policy objectives in a well-planned manner.

Now all we hear is the presto-pundits, coming out with their analysis of our military presence in Lebanon. "You lost," they say; "You retreated," they proclaim; all this with an "I told you so" tone of glee in their voice. But while the man in uniform is easy to identify at the scene of the action, it is unfair to pin blame on his lapel without looking at underlying causes.

So how can this Nation best use her military forces? By allowing the President to exercise his constitutional powers, and then holding him accountable for his actions; not be preempting his proper action by removing his powers.

We can do this by curing the few remaining symptoms of our past weaknesses. We must shirk off the Vietnam syndrome of humiliation and defeat, which hounds our capability to implement positive change. I believe a good way to start is for Congress to carefully review the War Powers Resolution of 1973.

Much has happened over the past 10 years. Perhaps now it is time to factor in the lessons we learned. Reviewing the War Powers Resolution could help us develop better ways to meet the needs of a dynamic, effective foreign policy. Heresy? I do not believe so.

I am not a constitutional scholar, and must judge this resolution's effects through my experience as a military leader. For this reason, I believe that while the intent of this legislation is good, the result is not as clear.

This resolution was born out of controversy, fathered by an uneasy Congress over the veto of a politically wounded President. It directs a President to consult whenever possible with Congress prior to introduction of U.S. forces into any hostilities or situations where imminent hostilities are clearly indicated; it requires a President to report to Congress within 48 hours after the introduction of U.S. Armed Forces into those situations; and to terminate the use of Armed Forces in hostilities, or situations of imminent hostilities, within 60 days. When bound by this resolution, the only alternatives then available are: Congress subsequently declares war, extends the 60-day time period or authorizes use of force as the President feels necessary * * * alternatives announced to the adversary for him to manipulate by counter-political strategies.

Proponents of this resolution say it is part of a valid congressional movement, designed to "create machinery for timely consultation and codetermination of national policy." This is a worthy goal, and I fully support the value of consultation between our Executive and Legislative branches.

Although drafted to limit what was seen as limitless powers of an imperial presidency—an answer to "no more Koreas" and "no more Vietnams"—the resolution's ability to keep us out of future Vietnams is questionable. Some forget Vietnam, in its early stages, was a veritable cause célèbre.

The Gulf of Tonkin Resolution, which committed us to Vietnam, passed in Congress by an overwhelming margin of 504 to 2. And it was not until the TET Offensive, 4 years later—long after we were deeply committed—that Bipartisan support of Vietnam began to erode on Capitol Hill.

The War Powers Resolution has had a far-ranging impact on our President's ability to exercise, and to implement, foreign policy in the world's trouble spots. His ability to act decisively and effectively is hobbled because the military arrow in his quiver of responses, the most effective symbol of resolve in executing a strong American foreign policy, has been blunted.

This is not to say military solutions are the best or only solutions available to this Nation. I have never proclaimed employment of military power as an option, except as a last resort. Military options are no panacea, and should never substitute for aggressive diplomatic efforts or other measures to implement national policy and strategy.

But many of these "other" measures are severely curtailed by legislation limiting foreign sales, educational exchanges, and effectively vetoing military and economic assistance through the budget process. Because of this, successive administrations have been forced to turn reluctantly to military force, or the threat of military force. This is sometimes the easiest, and only, option left to them.

This Nation uses military forces to prevent escalation of conflict, to force a diplomatic settlement. In other words, to keep peace with the least possible loss of life. But to accomplish this objective, military force must be sufficient, sustainable and credible. It is up to our President, as Commander in Chief, to use military power carefully in this way.

But military force, which is easy to call upon—because we are ready to go on a moment's notice—is difficult to use, particularly when there is no commitment to win. Military missions quickly grab headlines, national will begins to falter, self-doubt and self-criticism set in.

What was thought to be the easiest solution to our problems suddenly becomes very difficult. Unfortunately, because of restrictions, like the War Powers Resolution, we sometimes end up preventing our President from effectively using the tool of military force.

Henry Kissinger, in his definitive memoir—"Years of Upheaval"—relates a story about a tense moment during the October 1973 War when he, as Secretary of State, met with Soviet Ambassador Dobrynin. In a stiff warning, Secretary Kissinger told Dobrynin, "Any Soviet military intervention (in the Middle East)—regardless of pretext—would be met by American Force." But parenthetically, Dr. Kissinger adds in his book—and I quote—it would have been a more convincing threat had I made it on any other day. For that very day the Congress passed the so-called War Powers Act, whose purpose was to reduce Presidential discretion in committing American Military Forces. Unquote.

Domestically, this resolution is cited often by those who disagree with the President for the sake of political posturing. They challenge his decisions in the media, without either knowing the stakes at hand or producing viable alternatives. We see debate for political reasons, when we should see debate for policy formulation. The result? Unfocused micromanagement of foreign commitments, well beyond a time when policy should be fully implemented. Decisionmaking, and our security, is not enhanced in the process. Worse, those who interfere in this manner are seldom held accountable when failures occur.

Overseas, the international press focuses on what appears to be disunity and a lack of national will. Our friends and allies do not understand this process, and believe our commitments have a hollow ring. Our foes take hope and increase their resolve, waiting out partisan debate, hoping to win politically what they cannot win militarily.

This is dangerous, for when our intentions and capabilities are questioned, so is our ability to prevail if directly challenged. And when this is lost, deterrence—the foundation of our national strategy and what has helped avoid global conflict for about 40 years—is placed in jeopardy.

I am not speaking out against consultation between executive and legislative branches. Indeed, an effective national policy must be bipartisan in nature, the craft of able-thinking men and women throughout government. I am not speaking out against Congress' established constitutional role in foreign policy and military operations. I support Congress' ability, through the normal legislative process, to qualify our participation in hostilities. However, special legislation was not needed to require consultation or to enforce Congress' already-established powers.

What is needed is not a constitutional power-sharing debate, not political maneuverings required to avoid such debate, but a search for a solution to the tough global problems we must face.

This Nation must be ready, and must be seen as being ready, to use military power when forced to do so by our adversaries. We must show American power—not American paralysis.

I am not here to apologize for any past actions, military, or otherwise. I am proud of this Nation. I am proud of our Navy's capability to carry out missions assigned to us by our President. Our actions in Grenada are an example of how well we can do when we act quickly with identifiable goals. There, the military was given a precise mission.

Your military forces today are good. Let there be no doubt. I am proud of them and their growing capabilities. If this Nation had not reacted, at what I consider to be a critical turning point in early 1981, we would be in a considerably weakened state today.

So in answer to whether or not we could take prompt action to stem crisis, as we have in the past—I know the military capability exists, and when directly challenged, this Nation will come to its feet. But we need to guarantee more. We need to prevent crisis from turning to war. This is no easy task, but it can be accomplished by early use of all tools—diplomatic, economic and military—which are part of this Nation's coherent national strategy of defense.

The President has brought together all underpinnings of a national strategy. Now it is up to this Nation to let the President use the tools at his disposal. All our resurgent military strength or diplomatic undertakings will be of no use, if our national leaders do not have the freedom to act in accordance with constitutional powers. As a Nation, we have not done everything we can to insure our leaders have the freedom to act with strength. So, we must clear the decks of Vietnam-era debris—we must allow our leaders to lead.

To paraphrase William Pitt's advice to Great Britian in an hour of peril, America can save herself by her own exertions and help save the rest of the world by her example. Now, let us set the example—it is the right thing to do. Our historic mission of preserving peace and freedom requires no less.

Thank you and God bless.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished Senator from Maine.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the time of the minority leader be reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MATTINGLY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask that the Senator from Maine may use the time which would be allocated to him under routine morning business today in addition to the time I am yielding to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COHEN. I thank the Senator for yielding.

THE CHAPLAIN'S PRAYER

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I could not help but be impressed with the Chaplain's prayer this morning, as he referred to us as "word merchants" and said that death and life lie in the power of the tongue. I wholeheartedly agree with the Chaplain's statements.

Before I begin, Mr. President, Senator BIDEN has been delayed in arriving to the Chamber. He is going to partake later this afternoon in a discussion of the subject matter. I ask unanimous consent that his statement be included as part of this statement this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNITED STATES-SOVIET RELATIONS

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, in his January 16, 1984 speech on United States-Soviet relations, President Reagan spoke of a gap in American and Soviet perceptions and policy, and called for joint examination of concrete actions that both countries can take to reduce the risk of United States-Soviet confrontation. He concluded that "We may have to start in small ways, but start we must."

I wholeheartedly agree that we must start. This view was strengthened during the recent visit Senator BIDEN and I made to the Soviet Union at the invitation of the U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences. I would like, today, to outline some ideas on how this might be accomplished.

The focus of the Moscow visit was arms control and its interrelationship with United States-Soviet relations. I was disturbed by reports that the build-down proposal put forward by congressional forces had been rejected by the Soviet leadership as one-sided. According to these reports, the Soviets had characterized the build-down as a smokescreen proposed by the Reagan administration as a means of achieving a strategic advantage.

The meetings with Soviet scientists and Government officials included intensive sessions on the build-down proposal and other arms control matters. The discussions were candid and illuminating. It was evident that there were important aspects of the proposal which had not been well understood by the Soviets. Senator BIDEN and I were able to explain the origins, details, and flexibility of the build-down concept and discuss Soviet reactions to it.

We, in turn, gained a deeper understanding of Soviet perceptions and perspectives on the proposal. In sum, the discussions confirmed once again the need for, and value of, dialog.

The visit also provided the opportunity to explore briefly the troubling human rights situation in the Soviet Union. Meetings with a Jewish refusenik couple and a Russian Orthodox religious leader left me with a deeper appreciation for the amazing resilience and resoluteness of Soviet citizens. While there are no simple solutions to the deep problems faced by people such as refuseniks, it seems evident that the prospects for relaxation of restrictions generally improve during periods of improved contact and dialog with the West.

I believe that one can gain real insights into a people by experiencing the work of its artists. During our visit, Senator BIDEN and I had the privilege of meeting with two major Soviet poets. Interestingly, the context for the Moscow visit was most aptly characterized by one of them, Yevgeny Yevtushenko, who agreed emphatically that our two peoples needed to stay in touch. "If we don't stay in contact," he said, "we will forget each other's faces." It was a poignant and profound statement. While the invisible threads of friendship and understanding can never guarantee global peace, the absence of such bonds makes it easier, it seems, to plot more exotic ways of erasing those faces.

Upon our return to Washington, Senator BIDEN and I met with President Reagan and Secretary of State Shultz to report the details of our discussions in Moscow and offer our views on the implications for United States-Soviet relations. I would like to briefly outline these views and describe some steps I believe could be taken to reduce tensions and improve United States-Soviet relations.

The warm reception Senator BIDEN and I received in Moscow did not disguise the harsh feelings and wide gulf that exist between the United States and Soviet Governments. Recent statements and actions by the Soviet leadership confirm the impression we received in Moscow that the depth of suspicion is so great that the change in Soviet leadership will not alter the basic Soviet attitude.

The Soviets are by no means blameless for the present situation. I shall pass over the question of blame, however, because I believe such a discussion would not advance the objective of improved relations. Suffice it to say that a positive attitude on both sides is needed for progress toward mutual, meaningful understandings.

With regard to the suspended INF and START negotiations, I believe that neither side can simply rest during this unfortunate interregnum. In my view, each must continue to intensively study the issues, assess proposals, and prepare for productive dialog. It is my hope that such work is progressing.

Meanwhile, however, the sides must also work at getting back to the negotiating table. I believe there are a number of ways for the United States to promote this while maintaining our security and political interests. The approach I have in mind would not require concessions by either side on nuclear arms reduction issues. Rather, it would be directed toward improving the climate for United States-Soviet relations and creating conditions conducive to the resumption of intensive nuclear arms reduction negotiations. It would, at the same time, involve measures which would significantly improve understanding and make the world a safer place.

TEST BAN TREATIES

In July 1974, the United States and U.S.S.R. signed the Threshold Test Ban Treaty. In May 1976, they signed the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty. Neither agreement has been ratified.

The Threshold Test Ban Treaty would prohibit underground nuclear weapons tests having a yield exceeding 150 kilotons, and would limit permitted tests to specific designated test sites. The Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty would apply the 150-kiloton ceiling to underground nuclear tests undertaken for peaceful purposes outside the test sites designated in the Threshold Test Ban Treaty. It would also place a 1,500-kiloton ceiling on group explosions for peaceful purposes.

The treaties contain unique verification agreements providing for exchanges of technical information and for observers to have access to some explosion sites. These measures, along with the location restrictions in the treaties, would assist in each country's efforts to verify compliance with the threshold limits. This is particularly important in view of the questions each country has raised about the other's adherence to the provisions of the treaties. Once ratified, the exchange of information and observers, as well as the establishment of the United States-Soviet Joint Consultative Commission provided for in the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, would significantly enhance the ability of the sides to monitor events covered in the treaties.

I believe that the Threshold Test Ban Treaty and the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty would provide precedents for progressive verification measures in this area and would open a useful dialog on test ban issues. In the broader context of United States-Soviet relations, I believe that ratification of the treaties would help establish an atmosphere conducive to further agreements and would constitute a significant step toward reducing the risk of nuclear war. For these reasons, I urge the President to press for, and the Senate to support ratification of, these treaties. I am joined in that by Senator BIDEN.

BAN ON CHEMICAL WEAPONS

In last year's Senate debate on chemical weapons, there was one important point on which there seemed to be broad agreement: These particularly terrible weapons should be banned from the face of the Earth.

A decade ago, the United States and the Soviet Union agreed to begin work on a comprehensive ban on chemical weapons. Actual talks have been underway for nearly 8 years.

The United States conducted direct bilateral talks with the Soviets, but then shifted its efforts in 1980 to multilateral talks in the 40-nation Committee on Disarmament (CD). It apparently did so because it believed that pressure from the larger international community would facilitate progress in the talks.

The United States has pressed ahead with its efforts to achieve progress in the negotiations. In February 1983, the United States tabled a document detailing its views on what provisions a treaty should contain. This past January, Secretary of State Shultz announced that the United States would soon table a draft treaty. The February 1983, document and, undoubtedly, the draft treaty contain provisions for onsite inspection to verify compliance with a treaty ban. It was the difference of views on this between the United States and the Soviet Union that led to the stalling of the earlier bilateral talks.

In the past year and a half, the Soviet Union has on several occasions stated its willingness to consider onsite inspection as part of a treaty. It reportedly has been reticent in the multilateral CD talks, however, on the form of onsite inspection it would agree to, and little progress has been made on this in the negotiations.

For the United States to be satisfied that a ban on chemical weapons would be adequately verifiable, development of these details will be necessary. Because of the sensitive nature of the subject, I believe that frank discussion of these details can best be conducted in confidential, bilateral exchanges between U.S. negotiators. Indeed, as a former U.S. official responsible for chemical weapons negotiations has noted, a bilateral agreement between the United States and the Soviet Union is a prerequisite to a multilateral treaty. A similar view was expressed by the Department of Defense official now responsible for chemical matters.

Last November, Senator BIDEN and I introduced a resolution, Senate Resolution 283, calling on the President to vigorously continue the negotiating efforts in the Committee on Disarmament and to extend these efforts by proposing to the Soviets the resumption of bilateral talks.

Today, Senator BIDEN and I are introducing the names of an additional 33 Senators who have joined us in cosponsoring this resolution. This strong bipartisan support indicates, I believe, a consensus within the Senate that all available avenues to a chemical weapons ban should be pursued.

The United States has been an active participant in negotiations in the 40-nation Committee on Disarmament aimed at banning chemical weapons. I applaud these efforts and believe they should be continued to maintain international pressure for progress and to frame a comprehensive, multilateral ban.

At the same time, I believe it is necessary to resume bilateral talks to open a channel through which significant progress can occur.

Accordingly, I urge the President to propose such negotiations to the Soviet leadership.

EXPANDED CULTURAL TIES

As I indicated earlier, Mr. President, I am convinced that cultural ties can play a significant role in improving relations between nations and in advancing the type of understanding that can promote lasting agreements.

At the end of 1979, the General Agreements on Contracts, Exchanges, and Cooperation between the United States and the Soviet Union expired. Negotiations were held in December 1979 to renew the general agreement, but these did not succeed before the agreement lapsed. The negotiations have yet to be resumed.

According to a report from the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, since 1979, in the absence of an official agreement, the once very active exchanges in art exhibits and the performing arts between our two nations have virtually ceased. While some contacts between United States and Soviet theaters and writers have continued, these have not been, in any sense, at the same level as under the general agreement.

The United States has informed the U.S.S.R. that, despite the lack of an official agreement, it would be receptive to visa applications for Soviet artists. Unfortunately, the Soviets, citing the absence of an agreement, have not accepted the U.S. offer.

Arthur Hartman, the U.S. Ambassador to Moscow, has attempted to fill this gap to the extent possible by bringing American performing artists to Moscow at his personal invitation to perform for small Soviet audiences at the U.S. ambassadorial residence. I admire Ambassador Hartman's resolve and dedication and agree that we should do all we can to expand cultural ties.

On another level, some private U.S. organizations have continued cultural and educational exchanges with the Soviets, as well as discussions on world peace, arms control, and other issues. A few new exchanges have even begun, such as a program initiated by the U.S. National Academy of Sciences on arms control.

The commendable efforts of Ambassador Hartman and the perseverance of these private organizations cannot belie the unfortunate fact that most of the cultural contacts between the United States and the Soviet Union since 1979 can be accounted for in a few sentences.

In a recent television interview in Washington, Ambasssador Hartman indicated that he hoped for the resumption of talks on renewing the General Agreement on Contacts, Exchanges, and Cooperation. I strongly agree with his view and urge the President to formally propose to the Soviet leadership negotiations aimed at early renewal of this important agreement.

SPECIAL EMISSARY

Mr. President, I spoke earlier of my hope that neither side is resting during this unfortunate interregnum in nuclear arms reduction talks. I believe that work is progressing in Washington in preparation for the resumption of talks, and I hope that similar activity is taking place in Moscow.

As I noted, Senator BIDEN and I found in our discussions in Moscow that there was both a genuine interest in the builddown concept and an apparent lack of understanding of the flexibility and promise of the proposal.

One possible way of advancing useful study in both capitals during this interregnum period is to initiate a private channel of communication between the sides. What I have in mind is the appointment of a prominent American with solid credentials in the arms control area—an individual who does not hold a position in the present administration—to conduct nonpublic talks with the Soviets aimed at explaining and exploring positions and other considerations.

This person would in no way be a substitute for our present negotiators. Appointing a special emissary not presently a member of this administration would, I believe, demonstrate and promote the administration's more conciliatory posture and genuine desire for progress toward significant arms control agreements.

Mr. President, I have outlined today four measures which I believe would improve United States-Soviet relations, reduce tensions, and pave the way toward a safer world. There are other steps we could take, and I am presently exploring a number of these. I believe strongly, however, that we must move immediately to improve the atmosphere in our relations with the U.S.S.R. and feel that the measures I have described would move us significantly toward achievement of that objective. I urge President Reagan and my Senate colleagues to give serious consideration to these points and to search for other areas as well.

John Kennedy once said:

> We shall do our part to build a world of peace, where the weak are safe and the strong are just. We are not helpless before that task or hopeless of its success. Confident and unafraid, we labor on not toward a strategy of annihilation but toward a strategy of peace.

I believe these words aptly characterize the determination we must maintain in order to insure the continuation of humankind. It is incumbent upon us to do all that we can to seek Soviet cooperation in that effort.

(The following statement was made later and is printed at this point by unanimous consent:)

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, when Senator COHEN and I met with President Reagan March 6 to report on our February discussions in the Soviet Union, we suggested a variety of steps which we believe would improve the climate for United States-Soviet arms control negotiations. Today I would like to discuss two specific measures: Bilateral negotiations on a ban on chemical weapons and ratification of two pending treaties to limit the size of nuclear test explosions.

Ten years ago, President Nixon and Soviet President Brezhnev signed the Threshold Test Ban (TTB) Treaty, which prohibited underground nuclear weapons tests greater than an explosive yield of 150 kilotons—that is, roughly 10 times the force of the bomb used on Hiroshima. In the spring of 1976, the Ford administration concluded a companion treaty limiting the size of Peaceful Nuclear Explosions (PNE).

Although the treaties were not considered by the Senate during the Presidential election year of 1976, the incoming Carter administration formally requested senatorial approval in 1977. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee held hearings during the summer of 1977 and recommended approval on September 20. The following year, however, the committee decided against reporting the measures for Senate action in order to give higher priority to negotiations for SALT II and a comprehensive test ban.

Regrettably, negotiations for the test ban were suspended in 1980 and have not yet been resumed, and the SALT II treaty has never been considered and ratified by the Senate. In fact, the Senate has not ratified any major agreement with the Soviet Union since SALT I in 1972. These facts understandably raise doubts about our national intention to negotiate seriously and about our capability to implement agreements which are negotiated and signed.

Mr. President, I believe that Senate ratification of the still-pending TTB and PNE treaties would demonstrate America's renewed commitment to arms control, not only to the Soviet Union but also to other nations which may have begun to doubt that the superpowers would ever show restraint. The very process of ratification would also reopen important channels of government-to-government contact on arms control.

These treaties would have military utility as well as diplomatic significance because they would set a binding legal limit on the size of underground nuclear explosions and thus forestall the testing of large new nuclear devices. The long-held Soviet preference for high-yield weapons and high-yield tests makes these treaties more restrictive on the Soviet Union than on the United States. Although some officials in the Reagan administration may want to be free from any treaty restraints, then chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. David Jones told the Foreign Relations Committee in November, 1981 that the military had no plans to test above the treaty limit.

Other witnesses have pointed out additional advantages of ratifying these agreements, including the valuable precedent of having on-site inspections, as provided by the PNE treaty, and reducing Soviet confidence in their nuclear arsenal's effectiveness in a bolt from the blue attack. Since large yield weapons could not be tested at full power, there would be a cloud of uncertainty as to their wartime performance. Any such notes of caution help to reduce the chances of war.

In my view, we still would need an adequately verifiable comprehensive test ban agreement to impose a much more significant brake on weapons modernization by the Soviet Union. But the TTB and PNE treaties, already having been negotiated and signed, provide an available opportunity to enhance our security as well as promoting further arms control measures.

Perhaps the largest stumbling block to ratification of the TTB and PNE is the argument that they are unverifiable. The Reagan administration insists that it will not request Senate consent to ratification until the Soviet Union agrees to verification enhancement measures. The Russians respond that the United States has already signed the treaties. They say that if after their implementation we have lingering compliance concerns, then at that time we should discuss additional procedures for facilitating verification.

I have steadfastly insisted that an indispensable element of any arms control agreement into which the United States enters must be adequate verifiablility. As a member of the Select Committee on Intelligence since its establishment in 1976, I think I have a reasonably good understanding of the national technical means which our intelligence agencies employ to monitor compliance with arms control agreements. I certainly am aware of Soviet behavior under a variety of such agreements—which shows that they will exploit all treaty ambiguities and loopholes to the limit—and perhaps beyond. I would not in this or any other case support a treaty if we had to rely on the honesty or good faith of the Soviet Union to insure compliance.

In the context of these considerations, I am confident that none of the arguments about verifiability used against the Threshold Test Ban Treaty is decisive.

First of all both the TTB and the PNE treaties prescribe procedures for improving verification. In the case of the PNE treaty, these provisions are absolutely unprecedented in permitting on-site inspection. This sort of on-site inspection would be extremely helpful not only for this treaty but in experimenting with a practice that will more likely than not be necessary if we are to have meaningful future agreements regulating weapons ranging from cruise missiles to chemical munitions.

In a similar vein, the Threshold Test Ban Treaty requires the parties to exchange geological data about their test sites and yield information on several tests. If the Soviet Union were to provide this information to the United States, we would be able to narrow the range of uncertainty which afflicts our calculations of Soviet test yields. Furthermore, with ratification of the treaty, the United States would gain standing to question the Russians about compliance with the threshold ceiling in the same way that ratification of SALT I gives us a firm ground to probe the Soviets in the Standing Consultative Commission about their compliance with SALT I.

The objections is raised that even with an exchange of data after ratification, we would have to rely on the truthfulness of the Soviets to have supplied accurate data and, in doing so, violated one of the cardinal principles of verification policy. It needs to be noted, however, that the Soviets do not fully understand the national technical means that we use for monitoring compliance. If they did not provide accurate information, they would run a high risk of being caught in a contradiction which would be grounds in itself to claim noncompliance. They would be required under the TTB to provide data on the geology of their test sites and on the yields of certain tests. Without a full understanding of our national technical means, it is unlikely that they could provide information on geology and yields which would appear consistent to us unless they were consistent in fact.

Under the best of circumstances, however, there is going to be a range of uncertainty intrinsic to our judgments about Soviet compliance with a TTB. This state of affairs is not unique to the TTB. It is inescapable in all arms control agreements.

What the United States insists on when we assess the verifiability of treaties is not that we have an ability to detect every single violation. We require only that we detect militarily significant violations. While it will be possible for the Soviet Union to excede the 150 kiloton threshold limit without certain detection, for them to derive militarily significant information from a test, they would have to test a level where U.S. capabilities of detection are much greater. As Gen. Alfred Starbird, an official of the Energy Research and Development Administration, told the Foreign Relations Committee in 1977:

> They (the Soviets) may go somewhat over the design limit and they may go somewhat over the threshold. However, from the point of view of real significance in changing the picture as far as their military capabilities are concerned, if they do not go up to a point where we can detect it, we probably are not going to lose a great deal relative to them with respect to their military capability.

Mr. President, another action which I believe could lead to productive arms control would be the resumptions of bilateral negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union for a comprehensive and verifiable ban on chemical weapons. This of course, is the suggestion which Senator COHEN and I have already incorporated in Senate Resolution 283.

The United States and the Soviet Union conducted bilateral negotiations on chemical weapons from 1977 to 1980, then suspended them and pursued the issue instead in the multilateral Committee on Disarmament. In that forum in recent months both the U.S. and U.S.S.R. have indicated their interest in fashioning an agreement. The Soviet Union has made a proposal including some provisions for onsite monitoring and the United States has announced its plans to table a draft treaty.

While these developments are encouraging, we must recognize that the key to any agreement is the participation of the two superpowers which also have the largest stockpiles of chemical weapons. A resumption of bilateral talks, therefore, could provide the framework of provisions, especially the requirements for adequate verification, which could then be extended to other nations.

Recent reports on the use of chemical weapons in the Iran-Iraq war demonstrate that this is no longer an abstract or hypothetical issue. When such devices are available, they may be used in combat, notwithstanding the horrible consequences. Any usage anywhere makes it more likely that these weapons will be used again somewhere else. Since both the United States and the Soviet Union have given these issues careful thought and seem willing to engage in serious negotiations, we should seize this opportunity to press ahead. Our resolution would put the Senate on record in favor of vigorous bilateral negotiations.

Mr. President, these are specific suggestions which are worthwhile on their own terms as well as potentially helpful in bringing the United States and the Soviet Union back into constructive discussions on matters of mutual concern. Both nations have a common interest in working to reduce the risks of misunderstanding and conflict.

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator BIDEN and Senator COHEN in offering a Senate resolution which calls on the President to propose resumption of bilateral, superpower negotiations aimed at a comprehensive, verifiable ban on chemical weapons. Evidence of use of chemical weapons in the Iran-Iraq war is yet another gruesome reminder that the only way to insure these horrible weapons will not be used is to negotiate them out of existence.

Last year, the Senate was involved in divisive debates about resuming production of nerve gas. I fought hard to stop the introduction of these useless and dangerous weapons. I am pleased that a majority of my colleagues in the Congress shared this view, though I do not believe the battle is over.

The resolution we are offering today goes beyond the makeup of our own chemical weapons arsenal. It calls on the President to seek a negotiated comprehensive, verifiable ban on chemical weapons, first between the United States and the Soviet Union, and subsequently among all states. Talks did begin during the Carter administration to achieve this goal, but were suspended in 1980. Unfortunately, the present administration, at least until now, had decided that bilateral negotiations were not worth pursuing.

I am encouraged that the administration is prepared to discuss the future of chemical weapons in the 40-member U.N. Committee on Disarmament in Geneva. According to administration officials, the United States will soon table a draft chemical weapons treaty for discussion in the committee on disarmament. Yet, as much as I respect and value this important multilateral forum, I agree with a number of arms control experts who argue that bilateral talks between the Soviet Union and the United States hold out the only real prospect of reaching a verifiable agreement.

I am also encouraged that the Soviets have made their own chemcial weapons proposal which holds out the possibility of onsite inspection provisions. The most important prerequisite of an acceptable treaty is that it be verifiable. A treaty that relies on promises or Soviet good faith is one that no Senator would support. The best way to determine whether the Soviet Union will accept clearly defined verification arrangements is at the negotiating table.

I applaud my colleagues from Delaware and Maine for taking the lead in this critical area on arms control. Chemical weapons, like so many other weapons both sides possess, have a way of multiplying while politicians debate whether, when, and how to negotiate. We must engage in serious bilateral negotiations on chemical weapons before it is too late to devise meaningful controls. This resolution is a good beginning, and I urge my colleagues in the Senate to join us in this effort.●

● Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, I am pleased to join as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 283, expressing the sense of the Senate that the President should continue to vigorously pursue negotiation of a multilateral agreement banning chemical weapons and should propose the resumption of bilateral negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union to achieve a comprehensive and verifiable ban on chemical weapons.

Chemical weapons are a particularly violent and terrible way to wage warfare. Our ultimate objective should be to eliminate them from our military arsenals and ban them from the Earth.

I am not unaware of the difficulties of such an endeavor. There are verification problems, and these must be thoroughly resolved in order for acceptable agreements to be reached. There are, however, indications that resolution of verification difficulties is possible, and we should not fail to explore the possibility of such a resolution.

Because of the particular awfulness of chemical weapons, we should leave no stone unturned in our quest for negotiations. They may not succeed. But clearly the burden to try is on us—for our own good and that of the future of mankind.●

NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE SOVIET UNION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I am very happy that I was in the Chamber when the distinguished Senator from Maine (Mr. COHEN) spoke. I intend to speak on not precisely the same subject but a very similar subject.

I think this issue of negotiations with the Soviet Union on the nuclear arms race is the most important issue that confronts us.

I think all of us should realize this is an issue that will determine our survival as a nation and as individual American citizens and as human beings. I cannot think of any issue that is nearly as important as this.

So, I congratulate my good friend from Maine on his statement and I hope we can have a great deal more discussion of this matter by all Senators.

HOW SHOULD WE DEAL WITH THE SOVIET UNION IN THE NUCLEAR AGE?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, it is a grim and dangerous fact of life that the other superpower—the other custodian of an overwhelming nuclear arsenal—is the Soviet Union. How do we deal with this? First, we recognize exactly what we are up against in the Soviet Union. It is a dictatorship. It is totalitarian. That means the Communist government controls every aspect of Russian life—totally—all social, cultural, educational activity, every form of mass communication. So it is not a democracy. We cannot deal with it the way we would deal with a democracy. We cannot expect to secure Soviet cooperation and nuclear peace by appealing to the instinct for peace and survival that animates all people including the Soviet people. The Soviet people do not make any policy decisions in any sense or at any level. Public opinion does not count in the Soviet Union. Only a small, elite group of men in the Kremlin make the decisions for Russia. So how can we hope to achieve peace in dealing with this Communist dictatorship? There is hope because up to this moment the men in the Kremlin have been generally careful, cautious, Communist ideologues with occasional and serious exceptions. For instance, they did give the go-ahead to shoot down the unarmed Korean airliner, certainly a savage and impulsive act that shocked the world. It was also a blunder and a particularly stupid blunder. It served to remind the world of the paranoia the Soviets feel about penetration of their borders. But it was a blunder from any standpoint because it cost the Soviets dearly in the attitude of Western Europeans precisely at the time of the NATO stationing of intermediate range nuclear weapons on Western European soil. Giving orders to shoot down an unarmed Korean airliner that penetrated Soviet air space is a long way from pressing a button that could incinerate the world. It illustrates, however, the potential for off-the-cuff bungling under pressure that the old men in the Kremlin may suffer, if they are pushed to a decision on nuclear war.

Still it could be much worse. The Soviet leaders are not Hitler or Hirohito. They have shown none of the reckless arrogance that persuaded Hitler to sweep through Western Europe in 1939 or persuaded the Japanese to attack this country's assembled naval strength at Pearl Harbor in 1941. Oh, yes, they have not hesitated to send their military forces into action. But against whom? They order their tank battalions into little Hungary. They use their military might to suppress any dissent in a Poland already under the heel of Communist troops. They invade weak and primitive Afghanistan. They pour military supplies and ammunition into Africa, Cuba, and various parts of Asia. Altogether they have consistently played the part of the neighborhood bully. They are willing to take on a conspicuously smaller and feebler opponent any time, any place. But when they are challenged by someone their size as they were in 1949 in West Berlin and in 1961 in Cuba they back down. Obviously, in the Kremlin's judgment getting into a shooting war with someone their own size is for idiots. And it follows that getting into a shooting war with a country that has roughly equal nuclear capability is to the Soviets for madmen. A Hitler just might do it. A Tojo, too, might be tempted to do it. But not a Lenin or a Stalin or a Khrushchev and almost certainly not a Chernenko.

So what does this tell us about the policies we should follow in dealing with a Soviet Union armed to the teeth with nuclear weapons? It means that we do need to be strong and resolute. We need both qualities, strength and resolution. The Russians must know that we have the nuclear muscle and they must fully appreciate that we have the will, if necessary, to use it. Is this all we need as a policy to keep the peace in dealing with a nuclear armed Soviet Union? No. No. No. We have to remind ourselves everyday that we are no longer dealing with conventional weapons. We are not in a situation where there will be winners and losers. In past wars, as recently as World War II, even the losers have moved on to a better life and better things.

The instant a nuclear war starts, there will be only losers, total losers, finished, cold, end-of-the-road, dead and I mean dead losers. And both sides must recognize this. Squarely on that recognition both sides must build a mutual, verifiable agreement. For a comprehensive total end to the arms race both sides must keep that agreement to the letter and see that the other side keeps it.

Mr. President, in my next two speeches on the floor of the Senate on this issue I will discuss the next two questions in the "Common Cause Guide to Nuclear Arms Policy." No. 1, can the United States verify Soviet treaty compliance? and No. 2, do the United States and the Soviet Union have mutual interests?

FREEDOM RINGS IN ARGENTINA

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, a democratic miracle is taking place in Argentina. In a decisive repudiation of the military rule that has terrorized the nation for over half a century, the people of Argentina went to the voting booths last October and elected Raul Alfonsin as their new President. What does that mean? Alfonsin's victory represents a stunning defeat for the forces of tyranny and an unexpected triumph for freedom and democracy. We must pray that Argentina's long night of fear is truly over.

As the shroud of military rule is pulled back from the country, the horrors of that era are revealed. Nearly 500 unidentified bodies were uncovered in a mass grave outside of Buenos Aires in January. Formerly muted voices are reveling in their new freedom, telling of torture, abductions, and threats. As the former military ruler of Argentina, Reynaldo Bignone, placed the symbolic sash of office over Alfonsin's head in a civil ceremony last December, cries of "asesino," Spanish for assassin, filled the air.

One cannot read accounts of the events of the last few years without being awed by the great courage of the Argentinian people. At great personal risk, the mothers of the Plaza del Mayo held a vigil each day under the eyes of the military, demanding that their missing relatives be accounted for. Writers and journalists continued to chronicle the human rights abuses that they witnessed, despite death threats, abductions, and torture. And President Alfonsin has bravely confronted the military that he has displaced, arresting many of those responsible for the brutality of the last few years, including his predecessor as President, Reynaldo Bignone.

Mr. President, I know that you and my colleagues join me in praying that Argentina's brave experiment in democracy may survive its precarious genesis. And I know we all salute the courage of those who consistently called for an end to the military's human rights abuses despite the danger of such a stance.

Such courage should serve as an example for this body, that has yet to take a solid stance on a subject that ought to be above debate: Ratification of the Genocide Treaty. This document, which declares the serious physical or mental harm of a racial, ethnic, or religious group a crime punishable under international law, has languished unratified in this Senate for nearly four decades. It is with shame, for our long neglect, and hope, for a better future, that I daily call for ratification of the Genocide Treaty and have done so for about 15 years. We owe it to ourselves and to those who, like the brave Argentines, placed their lives in jeopardy for that principle that we profess to hold so dear: The right of humans to life and liberty.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

VOTING PRACTICES IN THE UNITED NATIONS—TREATMENT OF ISRAEL

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, as I announced yesterday, I plan to deliver a series of statements examining the voting behavior of U.N. members on key issues. The data on voting practices are drawn from the illuminating report from the Department of State and the U.S. mission to the United Nations that was issued in response to legislation I authored and which was enacted into law last fall.

Today I would like to focus on the first of these key issues: the U.N.'s treatment of the State of Israel. It is an issue which, I believe, dramatically illustrates the attempted subversion of the U.N. Charter's fundamental principles—here the principles of universal membership and peaceful resolution of disputes—by a determined U.N. coalition of antidemocratic, largely anti-Western U.N. forces.

Our Ambassador to the United Nations, Jeane Kirkpatrick, has often remarked how a disproportionate share of the U.N.'s agenda for speechmaking, consultations, drafting and voting on resolutions is given to Middle Eastern matters. And how a grossly disproportionate share concentrates on issues relating to efforts to delegitimize Israel, to undermine its prerogatives as a sovereign state, to belittle its quest for secure borders, and to stigmatize those associated with it. The overwhelming impact of these exercises in the United Nations has been not only to further international efforts aimed at delegitimizing Israel, but also to erode the hopes we all share for peace and stability in the region.

The senior Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), serving as President Ford's distinguished Ambassador to the United Nations in 1975 when the General Assembly approved the obnoxious resolution equating Zionism with racism, rightly described that vote as a triumph of "the jackals." That miserable resolution was only one of many in the United Nations designed to reduce Israel to the status of a pariah state.

As I learned firsthand when I served as a congressional delegate to the U.N. General Assembly during 1982, the expression "Zionism is racism" is not simply an instance of name-calling. When a state is singled out for branding as "racist," it means, in the culture of the United Nations, that that state no longer has any rights, only obligations. Its very existence is treated as a form of aggression, and anything calling itself a national liberation movement is, by the terms of various U.N.

resolutions, fully justified in using all available means against it. The corollary to this doctrine is, of course, that the pariah state is not permitted to defend itself.

The momentum of the campaign to delegitimize Israel has continued to gather steam. A majority of U.N. members are today willing to associate themselves with resolutions condemning Israel as the principal threat to peace and as the principal violator of human rights in the region. Forty-three states, members of the United Nations, are also willing to join in resolutions deeming Israel a leper state, contaminating those it comes into contact with and requiring as its only remedy the expulsion or suspension from the international community.

The jackals' steady, incremental successes at isolating Israel and her friends in the United Nations has emboldened them to attempt the outright exclusion of Israel from participating in the United Nations.

Let me demonstrate with two illustrative votes.

First, last year, the representatives of the progressive government of Iran made a motion—this being the second year in a row—to reject the Israeli delegation's credentials to participate in the General Assembly. Such a move would not only violate the principle of universality of membership which has made the United Nations a useful forum, wherein members at odds, even at war with one another, have been able to sit and talk at the same conference table, but also the law of the U.N. Charter.

The U.N. Charter explicitly reserves to the Security Council the right to decide, in exceptional circumstances, to suspend or expel a U.N. member. The Iranian motion last year was rejected through a procedural motion by Norway which asked the Assembly to decide to take no action on the Iranian motion. The Norwegian move was approved by a vote of 79 in favor, including the United States and Israel and our Western allies; 43 opposed; and 29 abstaining.

Forty-three U.N. members joined the jackals on this occasion. Forty-three members expressed a desire to exclude Israel from the United Nations through a procedure which clearly, and in the most flagrant fashion, violated the terms of the U.N. Charter. Among these were, of course, the Soviet bloc and radical states such as Libya. But also among them were countries truly friendly to us in other important contexts, some of them having vital security relationships with us. These include Somalia and the Sudan, Saudi Arabia, and Pakistan, Oman and Bahrain.

Outside of the Middle East, they include our friends Malaysia and Idonesia. Again in the Middle East, they include Jordan, Algeria, and the tiny, vulnerable, desperately poor state of Djibouti, which vitally relies upon us for assistance for the Ethiopian refugees who crowd its territory.

The countries that voted to exclude Israel voted against the primary purposes of the U.N. Charter—universality of membership and peaceful resolution of disputes. Whereas the U.N. Charter seeks to resolve conflict, they seek to exacerbate it. Can there be any doubt that the idea of scapegoating one nation subverts these key purposes and values of the Charter to which its members are pledged? Moreover, Mr. President, the countries that voted to deny Israel's credentials, did so knowing that had their votes formed a majority, they quite literally could have brought about the destruction of the United Nations.

It was also an act which directly affronted U.S. sensibilities and interests. Secretary Shultz had gone on record that, if Israel were excluded from the General Assembly, the United States would withdraw from participation in the Assembly and would withhold payments to the United Nations, until Israel's right to participate was restored. This would have meant a loss of at least 25 percent of the United Nation's funds.

It is also a fact that U.N. majorities are today willing to condemn the United States, without whose financial support the United Nations could hardly exist in the comfortable circumstances it now enjoys, simply for being a good friend of Israel.

The second vote I want to review happened last December, when the General Assembly passed Resolution 38/180E on the Middle East situation.

That resolution condemned the United States by name simply because President Reagan had met with Prime Minister Shamir to reaffirm America's historical commitment to Israel's security.

This obnoxious resolution was approved by a vote of 81 in favor; 27, including the United States and Israel, opposed; and 29 abstaining. New York Congressman STEVE SOLARZ, who served on our delegation to last year's U.N. session, very soundly called the vote especially repugnant to the United States. Congressmen SOLARZ said in the general assembly:

> It represents an inadmissible intrusion into the right of one sovereign state to conduct relations with another.

Mr. President, if this sort of abuse and ostracism can be inflicted upon the world's greatest power and the greatest bankroller of the United Nations, imagine the sorts of pressures that lesser powers feel when they are made to decide between joining the jackals and standing for moral and legal principle when standing for that principle just happens to involve the defense of Israel's legitimacy.

Abusive treatment of the United States in the U.N. long ago stopped being a novelty. But I know it still shocks American taxpayers that we allow over one and a half billion dollars of their tax dollars to go to support this exercise. As a nation we are generous to a fault, but we are not masochists.

How can we not be shocked when we see that among the nations that voted for the general assembly's resolution condemning the U.S. association with Israel were countries which, in other contexts, we consider friends, and allies—for instance our NATO partners, Greece and Turkey.

Another country that chose to take part in this gratuitous insult to the United States was the People's Republic of China. Still others include such major recipients of American aid as India, Pakistan, Egypt, and Zimbabwe. Indonesia, Malaysia, and Morocco—true friends of United States in many important contexts and relationships—also joined in voting for this utterly repugnant resolution.

Of course, the leaders in this exercise—those who provide the core voting strength and who discipline others to vote with them—are the Soviet Union, the Eastern European countries under its domination, and its cohorts and fellow travellers like Libya, Cuba and, Nicaragua.

In putting these facts before the Senate today I do not propose that we need necessarily respond by cutting aid to those countries that participated in these profoundly anti-American U.N. votes. As stated earlier, I fully agree with the judgment Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick expressed when she appeared recently before my Subcommittee on Foreign Operations. She declared that U.N. voting practices ought not to be the only, nor necessarily even the most important, consideration in our aid policies. The whole range of relevant economic, diplomatic, and political factors must be taken into account in such decisions. But if U.N. voting practices are not here the sole determinant, neither can they be ignored.

The American people should be made fully aware that certain countries receiving generous U.S. aid do, on occasion, vote in ways at the U.N. which are deeply offensive to the United States and to our cherished relationship with the Democratic State of Israel. The American people have a right to expect that their elected Representatives will not ignore these offenses. In my role as chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, I am committed to assuring that these expectations are met.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a table showing those countries which voted against the United States on these issues and are scheduled to receive U.S. foreign assistance in fiscal year 1985 be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, it should be pointed out that the table does not include those countries which abstained, even though in some cases an abstention can be interpreted as a vote against us. Those countries which voted against us on both of the issues I talked about today appear with an asterisk next to their names. The table also shows the proposed U.S. bilateral foreign assistance for each country for fiscal year 1985, the current year levels of assistance, and the historic levels of assistance from 1946 through the fiscal year 1985 proposal.

SPECIAL OPERATIONS FORCES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of the Senate a speech delivered by Mr. Noel C. Koch, who is the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs. The occasion of his remarks was the first anniversary of the Military Airlift Command's 23d Air Force.

The 23d Air Force is the Air Force component of this country's elite Special Operations Forces. Members of each service's special operations units perform those dangerous missions that Winston Churchill referred to as the art of ungentlemanly warfare. These forces vary in mission from countering terrorism to fighting insurgents, which are the most probable forms of conflict that we will face for the foreseeable future.

Past administrations have ignored these vital assets by allowing end strength reductions and severely underfunding equipment purchases and operations accounts. Mr. Koch, who is the Pentagon's expert on Special Operations Forces, points out that the Reagan administration has undertaken initiatives to revitalize these forces.

Because of the balance of power between the Soviet Union and the United States, the probability of nuclear war or conventional war in Europe is marginal. The threat, however, of Communist-supported insurgents to nations friendly to our interests and the threat of terrorists to U.S. civilian and military personnel will continue to intensify. It is imperative, therefore, that the Congress support the administration's plans for revitalization of our Special Operations Forces.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Koch's speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPEECH DELIVERED BY NOEL C. KOCH, PRINCIPAL DEPUTY ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE, INTERNATIONAL SECURITY AFFAIRS

General Mall, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, let me first say that I am honored to be with you on the occasion of your first anniversary. I wish you many happy returns.

I will be speaking with this evening on the issue of Special Operations Forces and, so that I am not seen as slighting combat rescue, I want to be clear that I am speaking of Special Operations Forces in a generic sense, and not specifically with regard to one of the roles of the 23rd Air Force.

I would note in passing an occasional tendency to dwell on pointless distinctions between special ops and combat rescue; in fact, the two may frequently be opposite sides of the same coin. But there is one distinction worth noting, which is really the basis of my brief remarks tonight, and it is that while nobody questions the need for combat rescue forces, there are very real differences of opinion as to whether we ought to have Special Operations Forces at all.

What is the substance of the debate over special forces?

First, let's look at the face of war in the nuclear age. The great fear in the post-Potsdam era has been that one of the two great powers possessing mastery over the nuclear genie might uncork the bottle. We have not worried about ourselves doing that, but about the Soviets doing it. The Soviets claim they worry about us doing it, and the rest of the world knows that it doesn't really matter who does it because when the elephants fight, all the other little creatures get trampled willy-nilly.

So we have pursued throughout this period a strategy of deterrence. Since every administration, and every generation of military thinkers, has to have itself attached to a so-called doctrine, we have had lots of doctrines—but only one real strategic objective—to deter the Soviets from seeking, or getting into a position to seek—its objectives through nuclear war or nuclear intimidation.

The strategy has worked. By its own lights the strategy has worked. Of course, it has cost trillions of dollars, and to this day we face questions about how much deterrence is enough and how much is too much. But, on balance, better too much than not enough.

Not only have we deterred nuclear war, but because of the danger of what we like to call conventional war sliding into a nuclear confrontation, we have essentially deterred conventional war, too—though Korea, for all that it was called a limited war, was certainly conventional enough. Viet-Nam was an anomaly: it was not a conventional war, but we tried, obstinately, from beginning to bitter end, to fight it conventionally.

So we have prevented nuclear war, and staved off conventional war.

Now, whatever the non-aligned, Third World nations like to think, the world is really divided in two—not three—countries that are communist and countries that aren't. There are the odd leaders with intellectual pretensions, usually professing Marxism, who are fatuous enough to think there are such things as fraternal relationships with Moscow. If Cain and Abel are the model, they are right, but that isn't an especially progressive model for international behavior.

So we really face a larger version of the question put in Lincoln's time, and it is whether the world can exist half slave and half free. By happenstance, we have a major share of the responsibility for the free half, and that half is still the larger—if you'll accept the logic of that—but it is smaller than it was before Potsdam, and it is getting smaller still every year.

At bottom, if our strategy is to prevent the world from going up in smoke, we are succeeding. On the other hand, if our responsibility is to prevent the world from going down the tube, we are not succeeding. We are not preventing an expansionist power from getting its way in the world, and enslaving nations as it goes—some seventeen in the past twenty-five years, with twenty-one more in contention today as a result of Soviet-inspired and supported insurgencies.

Why is this?

Well, we have pushed warfare away from the apocalypse, we have forced it down the spectrum of conflict to the low intensity end of the scale, and—behold—we don't have the means to fight down there.

So that's the proposition. It's an oversimplification, no question about it. It appears to assume that if we had had the forces to fight at the lower end of the spectrum, we would have done so, and we would have seventeen less countries under communist domination today. But let that be. Reasonable people grasp the point, I think, and the point simply is that we need the means to fight today's war where and how it's being fought.

The Reagan Administration sees this, and for this reason is working diligently to restore these forces designed to fight across the entire spectrum of conflict and, uniquely, at the low-intensity end.

It would be nice if we could take credit for an original insight, but the necessity for these assets has been understood for a long time, and at least one other Administration tried to create them, against enormous odds. President Kennedy took an active, personal hand in the effort.

What was the response to the direction of the National Command Authority?

The following are some quotes for which I am indebted to the research and writing of a Captain Krepinevich at West Point:

From Lyman Lemnitzer, then Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff: his view was that the New Frontier was "oversold" on the value of special operations forces.

George Decker, Army Chief of Staff in the same period, declared that "any good soldier can handle guerrillas."

Maxwell Taylor, Lemnitzer's successor, remembered thinking that the U.S. knew how to handle guerrillas because of experience derived from our Indian Wars, and "All this cloud of dust that's coming out of the White House really isn't necessary."

And Decker's successor, Earle Wheeler, said "The essence of the problem in Vietnam is military." And in an ironic and costly way, Wheeler was right. A major part of the problem in Vietnam was military—the American military, whose leadership had been training itself to, and clinging to, the Napoleonic Wars, the Civil War and similar models while Mao was rolling across China, and France was getting rolled around Indochina, and Castro was rolling up Cuba.

Yet there is a worse indictment than lack of preparation. It is possible and it is forgivable, to get caught short, if you learn from the mistake and straighten it out. It is another thing to resist correction, defiantly to refuse to learn anything, and to do that repeatedly for twelve bloody years.

The results were pre-figured in a study done by General Dick Stilwell, which looked at the JCS capacity for addressing the problem, and found it had "no in-house capacity to generate the proper doctrine or forces, and (was) indifferent to or sluggish in its response to directives from the administration to place such matters on high priority."

Where are we today?

Well, we're at the 23rd Air Force Dining Out for one thing, and part of the reason we're here is because the Air Force recognized the importance of special operations forces, and the need to provide a place for them, a focal point for them, and a high level voice for them. So that's good.

And the Army has created the First Special Operations Command down at Bragg, presumably out of the same motives.

The Navy has no counterpart to such commands, but the Navy is doing its comparable bit.

The words from the White House are good. Here's a memorandum from Bud McFarlane to the Secretary of Defense about an SOF briefing we provided recently. He says, "It is a compelling presentation which reaffirms the importance of revitalizing the U.S. special operations force capability. If possible, the Secretary of State should be offered this same briefing at the earliest convenience.

"I believe the SOF program you have undertaken is essential to our national security. Ensuring its rapid and successful completion should be a top Defense Department priority. You have my full and continuing support and that of the President in this endeavor."

We have the October 3 memorandum from then Deputy Secretary Paul Thayer saying that "U.S. national security requires the maintenance of Special Operations Forces capable of conducting the full range of special operations on worldwide basis, and the revitalization of those forces must be pursued as a matter of national urgency." The memorandum helpfully goes on to explain how you go about pursuing something as a matter of national urgency.

So that's good.

And no one could say, as they could with some of the New Frontiersmen, that all this is so much hooey from the so-called defense experts, who derived their skills from dubious academic battle in the Ivy League. The National Security Advisor has a distinguished record as a Marine. The Secretary of Defense was an Infantry Platoon Leader in the South Pacific. The Deputy Secretary of Defense who signed the 3 October memo was an air ace.

But just to be sure, we got some additional military authority—high-ranking, distinguished, and disinterested by virtue of retirement, some with special ops backgrounds, others not, and we asked them to form a Special Operations Policy Advisory Group for the Secretary. The group consists of Admiral James Holloway, Lt. General Sam Wilson, Lt. General Leroy Manor, Lt. General Jim Ahmann—you've probably heard of some of these fellows—Major General Dick Secord, and Brigadier General Don Blackburn.

That's heavy water. They fully and forcefully support the revitalization effort, as an independent source of counsel, a sounding board, a reservoir of ideas and inspiration, and a check against overexuberant policymakers.

So there's that.

We knew this effort wasn't going to come together unitl we had a joint mechanism to pull it together—to develop doctrine, to assess roles and missions to rationalize training and exercises, to rationalize and streamline procurement, to provide proponency, and so on. And out of that awareness came the Joint Special Operations Agency in the Joint Staff.

Secretary Weinberger has conveyed to the Joint Staff that "It should be understood that the work of this unit is of the very highest priority."

Perhaps most important of all, the CINC's are behind this effort, and as recently as two months ago I was present when they were in Washington and declared themselves in support, eloquently and forcefully—among the most compelling supporters being CINCMAC— General Ryan.

And we've seen some progress on the budget side, with some encouraging new commitments.

So take it all around, we have cause to be hopeful tonight, and it's always good to be hopeful—hope is a noble and civilizing human grace. But if anyone is more than hopeful—if anyone thinks we're making real progress and that we're on a roll, they are kidding themselves.

Everything we've managed to put in place has been in place before at one time or other, and has been successfully taken apart by those who objected to Special Operations Forces. Everything we thought to do—including getting this doctrine into our Service academies and schools, has been tried before. There was a counterpart to the Joint Special Operations Agency before.

First SOCOM is nice, but we already see the Army nibbling away at it. Fortunately, they are not especially deft, and they nibble with a meat ax, so it's easy to track.

It is true we have a new Special Forces Group coming on line, but it will be hollow. We have a hair-raising audit of the 10th Group Special Forces which indicates the real priority assigned to Army special operations forces, and I only wish it weren't classified so I could share it with you. All of this, too, brings a sense of déja vu, through an exasperated memo from President Kennedy to Secretary McNamara saying: "I am not satisified that the Department of Defense, and in particular the Army, is according the necessary degree of attention and effort to the threat of insurgency and guerrilla war."

As you know, readiness is a function of the extent to which a unit's TO&E is filled out. This in turn is a function of when the unit is to deploy. Units designated for D or pre-D day deployment are to be at full manpower and equipment strength. Yet with all the fuss and Service lip service about priorities, the Authorized Level of Organization—the ALO's—for Special Operations Forces are wholly inconsistent with their deployment times, and they are undermanned and underequipped, while units which may never move at all enjoy lower ALOs, and are fleshed out and fully equipped.

The Talons we got in the budget are encouraging, but somehow the cost estimates were off (as they have been for the past three years), and I will not be surprised if it is shortly suggested that we reduce the buy or protract the procurement.

And, of course, nothing that is controversial goes forward without friction, so with the best will in the world relationships that were once warm and open must frequently now be nurtured even to remain civil. My all-time favorite example of resistance came from the 3-star on the Joint Staff who sent a handwritten threat to one of his Colonels working a special operations initiative. "If you keep on with this," the note said, "your next billet will be in a Dempsey Dumpster."

It won't do to argue that what we see is a normal institutionalized resistance to something new. Because the capability we need isn't something new at all, and the effort to recreate it or restore it isn't something new either.

To the contrary, this is a doctrine and a capability the necessity for which is continually inflicted upon our Services by military realities; as often as it is resisted and abused, it persists and is sustained not by pestiferous civilians, but by what is going on in the world.

This persistence is an interesting phenomenon, because there is a traditional resistance to anything new, and because there has been general success at institutionally smothering and destroying anything new. Take gliders as a case in point. Better yet, mountain troops. This is a marvelous case study.

The first regiments of what became the 10th Mountain Division were formed in 1941, and yet with the exception of one brief misadventure in the Aleutians, the 10th sat out most of the war, being fought finally in 1945—at which time they proved to be absolutely marvelous. But this refusal to use the 10th was a little revenge against the 10th for getting itself established at all, and at the end of the war it was dismantled. Today we have no cold weather, mountain capability except a few folks we send from various units to Alaska for training.

Now I dwell on that episode because it has this interesting twist. The Mountain Division was designed to fight in Europe. It proved itself in Europe. Much of our planning, our doctrine, our procurement, our budgeting looks almost longingly to Europe. Now if your fondest wish is (if you have to fight) to fight in Europe, wouldn't you think you'd want the benefit of an asset that proved its value in Europe? No. Why? Because it's different. Because it wasn't invented in the right place. Not only that but, curiously enough, it was forced into existence by civilians.

So the Mountain Division is dead; illogically, inexplicably dead, and a testimony to the system's ability to destroy even the best ideas.

And yet special operations forces persists, in spite of skilled opposition in the system.

It won't do to say that reasonable people can have reasonable differences on such issues, when the need for the capability is so palpable and the cost of neglecting it is so amply documented—in the gross sense that Vietnam should have been one big lesson learned; or in the more surgical sense in which the findings of the Holloway report on Desert One are in the process of being relearned again.

Make no mistake. The resistance is there, though it seldom comes into the open. No counter-argument is offered to the need for SOF. No cleansing debate is proposed to clear the air by those who oppose revitalization. To the contrary, there are even occasional pretenses at acceptance, which reminds me of the old story about ladies and diplomats:

When she says no she means maybe, when she says maybe she means yes, but if she said yes she wouldn't be a lady.

When he says yes he means maybe, and when he says maybe he means no, but if he said no he wouldn't be a diplomat.

I have discovered in critical areas of the Pentagon, on the subject of special operations force revitalization, that when they say no they mean no, when they say maybe they mean no, and when they say yes they mean no, and if they meant anything but no, they wouldn't be there.

So we have a task, and it is one to pursue with respect, good humor and affection: it is to build our special operations force capability in spite of those who oppose it, and to win over those who oppose it, and to have no rancor in the family over it. It is no small task; but, then, the purpose is no small purpose.

I have to tell you a story out of school to close, and it involves a bit of our strategy for achieving revitalization.

You will see that Mr. Thayer's October 3 memo is not only unclassified, but more than that it concludes with a paragraph saying "You should disseminate this memo as widely as possible within your organization to ensure that the priority attached to this program is clearly understood."

We discovered that when we put directives on SOF revitalization in the Defense Guidance and other classified documents that they were easy to ignore. "Oh," said one fellow, "we want to do whatever you want done, but we don't know what it is. You have to be more specific." That's called a slow roll in case there is anyone here tonight who just arrived from Mars.

And then the directives were also containable—only a small group knew what was wanted, and thousands of others who recognize the need for this capability and would be encouraged and support it if they knew it was being supported in the Administration—well, they didn't know. The answer to the question "If a tree falls in the forest and nobody hears it does it make a noise? is 'Who cares? It doesn't matter.'"

So if this initiative were made public, it would matter, and it would be evident that those who see the necessity for this capability, and those who see the efficiency of it and the force multiplication consequences of it, and those who see the cost of neglecting it again all care. And you might from time to time say so. This is the educational process. I hope you will help us in pursuing it.

Again, happy birthday, and good luck.

Thank you.

BEIRUT VETERANS AND S. 2269

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, a March 19 article in the Washington Post—"Marines' New Foe: Memories"—about the postwithdrawal psychological status of some U.S. marines who served in Beirut left me with a strong sense of deja vu.

Debate over the wisdom of the policies which led to our experience in Lebanon and over the extent to which those policies parallel earlier ones which led to our Vietnam experience will go on for some time. However, one thing we must not repeat from the days of Vietnam is our documented failure during and after that conflict to pay adequate attention to the needs of those who faced hostile fire even as the military involvement itself was debated.

It was not until 1979 that the Congress finally mandated the establishment of a Veterans' Administration program to provide readjustment counseling assistance to Vietnam veterans. The Senate passed this legislation—which I first introduced in 1971—five times before it was finally signed into law.

Recognizing the psychological scars that combat often leaves—particularly when the mission is not clear, support on the homefront is in doubt, and the outcome is inconclusive at best—I have introduced legislation, section 4 of S. 2269, which would allow the VA to provide readjustment counseling to members and former members of the Armed Forces who served after May 7, 1975, the end of the Vietnam era, in situations involving armed conflict similar to wartime service. I am convinced that this is one appropriate step that we can and should take to assist, for example, the marines who served in Beirut.

Hearings on S. 2269 will be held on April 11 before the Veterans' Affairs Committee. I urge my colleagues to examine section 4 of this measure in light of the Post article and to lend their support to the bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Post article be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, March 19, 1984]

MARINES' NEW FOE: MEMORIES

(By Herbert H. Denton)

ABOARD THE U.S.S. TRENTON.—On a clear night you can barely see Beirut from this warship.

Faintly through the big night-vision telescope mounted on the bridge, there is the silent play of the white flashes of mortars and rockets and the red streaks of tracer bullets darting in and around the high-rises that ascend the coastal plain to the green hills above.

But if the blood and agony of Beirut is now mostly out of sight for the 540 U.S. Marines on this 16,000-ton amphibious assault ship cruising out of harm's way 20 miles off the coast of Beirut, their experience back there is far from being out of mind.

Settling in on them is the belated recognition of the gruesome appearance of death, bitter confusion about their mission and deep worry that they will be blamed for the Lebanon failure.

"They feel kind of used, kind of useless," said 2nd Lt. Phil Smith, 29, of Houston. "They feel kind of cheated. Most of them are pretty smart to realize that although we represent the U.S. government, it was the government that failed."

There is more. Abrupt awakenings, at full alert, from nightmares of being back at Beirut airport and taking shellfire; a caution, borne of a now-unrealistic fear of snipers, when walking down the ship's passageway; a sudden tension at the sound of any crashing noise.

Capt. Thomas Falkenthal, a priest from Chicago serving with the Marine Battalion Landing Team, said he worries when he hears some troops say they want to completely erase Lebanon from their memory.

"That kind of raises a caution flag," he said, "because then it becomes a ghost. Sometimes you have to look a ghost in the eye."

From the top down there is confusion about the mission now of the five troop-carrying ships bobbing off the Beirut coast, avoiding the rough currents. The Marines have physical training and classroom studies and watch television videotapes flown from the States. The "highlights of the day," said the battalion landing team commander, Lt. Col. Ray Smith, are breakfast, lunch, dinner and the evening movie.

To ease the boredom, the Dallas Cowboys cheerleaders were brought out this weekend; a rhythm-and-blues group, the Kissy Darnell Revue, is to perform later and shore leave is planned at Haifa, Israel.

But, Falkenthal said, major preoccupation of many of the young marines is an intense personal reflection on the friends who died and the Lebanese who may have been killed in the marines' retaliatory strikes.

"There is no one in this battalion who doesn't know a marine who was killed," said Capt. Christopher Gunther of Dayton, Ohio. "It is a very difficult thing for us to grapple with now that we're on the ships: Why did 238 marines die in Beirut?"

Some of the marines are seeking solace in religion. Sixteen on the Trenton without any formal church ties have formed a group. A 25-member Bible-study group meets six evenings a week on the USS Fort Snelling. Mass is said each morning on the USS Guam.

"I feel lucky to be alive," said Sgt. John Ensign, 27, of Hartford, Conn. "I'm going to use every moment of my life to be as productive as I can. I'm not going to take anything for granted. When the big shells were coming in, all of us in that one bunker, we could hear the shells whistling in and coming closer. We thought the next one could hit us and we were powerless to do anything about it. Your heart rate goes up, you smoke a lot of cigarettes and say a lot of Hail Marys. I say a lot more Hail Marys now even though we are out of danger."

Most of the rank-and-file marines on the ships were nine or 10 years old at the end of the U.S. involvement in Vietnam but they are painfully aware of the stigma that attached to veterans of that war when they went home.

They were extremely sensitive to a recent Newsweek cover showing the Marines departing from Beirut, and the label: "The price of failure."

"For the role they gave us we did outstandingly," Ensign said heatedly. "We weren't allowed to stop the fighting [between the Lebanese factions]. People look at it as if the president's policy failed, therefore the Marines failed, but we did what we were supposed to do. The president's policy failed. We did outstandingly."

Historians will no doubt long argue where American policy veered off course in Lebanon and where the mission had already failed by the time the 22nd Marine Amphibious Unit landed on the Beirut shore to replace marines in the 24th Amphibious Unit who had endured the devastating Oct. 23 bombing of their headquarters that left 241 U.S. servicemen dead. A total of 264 U.S. servicemen died during the U.S. deployment in Lebanon.

But there was no feeling among the men of the 22nd that all was lost in Lebanon when they arrived, rather, their spirits were high, lifted by their success in Grenada, where they had been diverted on the cruise to Lebanon.

The diary of Smith, the 22nd's battalion commander, records some of the mixed emotions on that cruise:

"Oct. 23. 0700. BBC [British Broadcasting Corp.] reports a bomb destroyed Marine headquarters in Beirut. Not sure which. Many casualties."

Later, that afternoon: "It appears we're definitely going to do something in Grenada," and, "Oct. 24. It's on."

For the next 10 days, the dairy is filled with details of the swift Grenada operation that brought enthusiastic support in the United States and outpourings of gratitude from Grenadians. Then: "3 Nov. Liberation of Grenada over, back aboard and headed for Beirut."

"5 Nov. Wire service picked up says Marine ground forces may be used to knock out rocket launchers in range of Beirut International Airport. Well-planned night raids and ambushes could do wonders I think."

But the Marines' role was not changed by Washington. They remained in static defenses around the Beirut airport, firing only when fired on. Once ashore, they came to realize that saving Beirut not only was a military proposition but involved complex political issues.

Initially, Marine troops, many of whom had been in Beirut to assist in the evacuation of the Palestine Liberation Organization in the summer of 1982, were impressed by the improvement in the Lebanese Army.

But when the Army command decided in early February to shell intensely the southern Shiite slums on the edge of the airport where many Lebanese soldiers lived, the Marines saw the Army begin to dissolve.

"If you had asked me on the first of February if I thought there was a chance they were going to make it, I would have said, 'Yeah,'" Smith said. "But in shelling the southern suburbs, they made a gross damn error and it cost them their country."

Officers aboard the Trenton get daily briefings on the Lebanese talks in Switzerland and they are voracious readers of copies of the English-language Beirut Daily Star that visitors bring aboard. But there is little desire to return to the blood-stained shores except to evacuate Americans still there.

In searching for a silver lining in the experience, Falkenthal sees it in the performance of the Marines themselves.

"Integrity and discipline remained intact," the priest said, "and that wasn't a small accomplishment."

ASSISTANCE TO TORNADO VICTIMS IN SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, last week, 18 people died, hundreds were injured, and thousands left homeless, as a violent tornado plowed a path of destruction across my home State of South Carolina. I saw firsthand the impact of this tragedy, and I am pleased that President Reagan quickly responded to our State's request by approving Federal disaster assistance to six counties which were hardest hit by these storms.

For those suffering personal loss, the road to restoration is a long and tedious one. However, many of these tornado victims have already found strength and encouragement from the great outpouring of aid they have received from others throughout their communities. People from all walks of life, from all regions of the Nation, united in one purpose—to help the helpless and give hope to the hopeless.

Mr. President, thanks to the outstanding contributions of concerned individuals, churches, corporations, and other organizations, thousands of needy people are finding it more bearable to rebuild their lives in the aftermath of this tragedy. A recent article in the State newspaper gives but a few examples of how people donated their time, talents, and resources to assist those most affected by the tornado. The article shows, among other things, that the spirit of volunteerism is alive and well in America, and that our greatest resource truly is our people. We can all be proud of the individuals and groups which provided this much-needed aid. Their compassion and generosity is extremely heartwarming, and the Palmetto State owes them a great debt of gratitude. I ask unanimous consent that this article be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHO CARES? A LOT OF PEOPLE

When ill winds swept through South Carolina on Wednesday night, sowing death and devastation in six counties, they left behind a mixed legacy.

There were 18 dead, beyond help, and seven missing, hundreds hurt and thousands homeless—victims of a sudden rush of twisting wind that in an instant changed their lives. That was the legacy of debris and despair.

But in the aftermath of the tornadoes, those victims are beginning to see as well the legacy of hope and helpfulness—friendship from strangers they never saw before the storm and likely will never see again.

In asking for federal disaster aid Friday, Gov. Dick Riley praised the human compassion that has helped to ease the tragedy for many victims.

"The citizens of South Carolina have shown kindness and have shown consideration to their neighbors, and today I am extremely proud to be called a South Carolinian," Riley said.

"Offers of assistance have come in from all over the country. The outpouring of volunteer support from companies and individuals has been heartwarming."

But the governor also said it will be weeks or months before victims of the storms will no longer need help from outside.

"We've had a serious disaster," he said. "I don't want anybody to take it lightly. For some of us, the disaster seems like it's over, but for those victims it will be here next week and the next."

These are among the efforts to help already being made:

In Newberry County, some of those folks sifting through the rubble and clearing away debris are Mennonite volunteers from Lewisville, Ga. Before they return to their own homes, they plan to be sure that some Newberry homes are repaired and fit to live in again.

"Carpenters for Christ" from Rome, Ga., are rebuilding the tiny town of McColl in Marlboro County, and fellow carpenters from Alabama and Tennessee are on the disaster crews in Bennettsville and Winnsboro.

The Carpenters for Christ are Southern Baptist laymen who regularly travel to disaster areas with their own money and on their own time to help rebuild communities. They work all weekend in communities that have been ravaged by tornadoes or other natural disasters, then go home to spend the week on their regular jobs as firemen, plumbers, electricians, draftsmen, engineers, and construction workers.

Eight engineers, representing several professional engineering societies, are in Newberry County this weekend to test the structural safety of buildings that remain standing.

The Bi-Lo food store chain, headquartered at Mauldin, delivered $35,000 in groceries—two truckloads—to Bennettsville, Newberry and Winnsboro on Saturday.

The R.J. Reynolds Co. has provided $100,000 cash assistance to the disaster relief effort, as well as 100,000 cans of food from its Del Monte subsidiary and 24,000 cartons of tobacco products.

And the Sunbelt Beer Distributors—the "Coors-to-you" folks—have offered bottled water from the Rockies for Marlboro County and other areas where water supplies appear to have been contaminated.

Clothing is being collected by the Salvation Army in Columbia and Florence and by the Roman Catholic St. Vincent De Paul Societies in Columbia. Collection points have been set up at the St. Vincent De Paul Thrift Store on River Drive and at the parish offices of Our Lady of the Hills Catholic Church, off Ashland Road on Old Shepherd.

A California garment manufacturer has offered assorted "seconds" to victims of the storm.

The Xerox Corp. has offered employee manpower to work at disaster relief sites. Those who do won't lose any pay at the office.

And the South Carolina Hotel and Motel Association is organizing a program to raise dollars for disaster relief. Each member hotel is being asked to pledge $1 for every room rented this weekend. The association hopes hotel and motel guests will match the dollars generated by their room rentals.

Then there are neighbors helping neighbors. East Baptist Church in Clio wasn't damaged, so it's been opened as a shelter to the homeless from nearby McColl.

And Chesterfield lost some crops but suffered little other storm damage. So the rescue squad there collected food and clothing for neighboring Marlboro, where damage was extensive.

The Hanes Hosiery plant in Bennettsville escaped damage, but the Hanes Group knew some of its emplyees were left hurt or homeless by the tornadoes. The company trucked blankets and clothing into Bennettsville on Friday.

Boy Scouts have helped in the food and clothing distribution centers, and American Red Cross volunteers have been manning emergency shelters, providing food and a place to sleep for the homeless. Some volunteers also have scoured the countryside for people sleeping in cars to tell them the shelters are open.

The county welfare offices in Newberry and Winnsboro are open this weekend to receive and distribute food, clothing, blankets and whatever else arrives. The collection point for Marlboro County is in Bennettsville High School.

Staff from the Lexington County Department of Social Services are helping out in the DSS offices in the affected counties. Lexington County DSS Director Bill Walker developed that plan so disaster relief workers could get a little relief of their own, a state DSS spokesman said.

And Curly Fallaw, a 60-year-old bluegrass performer from West Columbia, is asking fans to donate money or goods to the Salvation Army to help the tornado victims. Fallaw said he also is available for charity shows, if any are planned.

More help is on the way, too. A truckload of food from Ohio should arrive in South Carolina today or Monday, and the folks in Marion, Ill., who recall needing some help after their own tornado disaster a few years back are planning some relief for the Carolinas.

While at least four counties have already been declared eligible for federal disaster aid, not much of that money will go to individuals and families.

The bulk of it will be used to rebuild businesses, public facilities, roads and highways and communities in general. Some will provide temporary housing while insurance replaces insured homes, and some will provide food stamps and unemployement compensation.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BONDS

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I recently wrote to Assistant Secretary John Chapoton of the Treasury Department to urge that the administration reconsider its opposition to the continued use of Industrial Development Bonds without burdensome restrictions.

I am sorry to report that Assistant Secretary Chapoton's response reaffirmed the administration's position.

Although it is clear to me that the Treasury Department's position on this issue will not change, I did want to point out that these bonds have been used to provide industrial expansion throughout the State of Arkansas. Many businesses have located in Arkansas, and they have been able to finance the construction and expansion of their facilities using IDB's. Over $4 billion has been invested through Industrial Development Bonds. Since the creation of the Arkansas Industrial Development Commission in 1955, there have been 4,318 new plants in the State of Arkansas creating 330,000 new jobs. Today, 249 of the Fortune 500 firms have facilities in Arkansas. This expansion has been due, in substantial part, to the availability of IDB's.

The indisputable fact is that these bonds have been instrumental in creating jobs. This means unemployment has dropped when a new business comes to town, or when an existing plant expands. Additionally, it means that the people starting to work become taxpaying citizens. It is for this reason that I believe the revenue estimates on IDB use are erroneous. Because jobs are created through the use of IDB's, this fact should be taken into account in determining the revenue impact.

To the extent that there have been abuses in the IDB area, they should be corrected, and I believe members of both tax-writing committees will be more than willing to address them. I do not believe, however, that we can cripple this program in an effort to get at some of the problems that could be stopped through other means.

These bonds help create jobs, and I hope this program can be extended in a way that promotes economic development.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

S. 2524—U.S. COPPER INDUSTRY

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, the bill I am introducing today addresses a problem that I have talked about many times on the floor of the U.S. Senate. As time passes I have witnessed a continual deterioration of the U.S. copper industry. Unfortunately, the problem is like a bad penny, it will not go away. I am referring to the trade problems facing the copper industry and the mining industry in general.

The financial condition of the copper industry has deteriorated for the past 5 years, registering increasingly severe losses since 1980. The situation has gone from critical to bleak.

The 60.5 cents per pound price reached in January of this year is the lowest real price in more than 50 years. The average price of copper during the 20th century, in present dollar terms, has been $1.15. Every U.S. copper company is losing money. During 1983, the industry lost 16 cents on each dollar of sales.

Only 9 of the country's 25 largest mines were operating at the end of 1983. For every three copper workers that there were in 1979, one is out of work and unlikely to be called back.

My bill, the copper and extractive industries Fair Competition Act of 1984 addresses three interrelated issues. First, there is the problem of loans that cost Americans jobs. These are the project loans made by the World Bank and other development banks for mines, smelters, and refining plants. The purpose of these loans is to increase the production capacity for surplus commodities like copper. These are loans to produce more of something the world has too much of already.

Second, there is the problem of a copper glut caused partially by a disregard of the law of supply and demand by Government-owned copper producers. Many people do not realize that the U.S. copper companies are not competing in a free enterprise environment.

We sometimes believe that because we have free enterprise in America it is free enterprise in the rest of the world.

U.S. competition is foreign governments which generously subsidize production. Codelco is part of the Chilean Government and ZCCM and Gecamines are one and the same at their respective governments of Zambia and Zaire. These companies are as much a part of their governments as the U.S. Senate is a branch of our Government.

These foreign governments are, in turn, backed by the IMF, the World Bank and other development financing institutions. Companies competing with foreign governments has become a major consideration because about 40 percent of the free world copper production is foreign-government owned. This wave of copper company nationalization began in Chile in 1969 and has spread to almost all of the major copper producing LDC's. These same countries are members of CIPIC, the OPEC of the copper producers. I will come back to and discuss CIPIC more in a few minutes.

The third issue addressed in my bill can best be characterized as the crutch that cripples. The reference is to assistance available at the IMF through its compensatory financing facility.

What I am going to describe shortly I am positive is not understood by the U.S. Senate. I am absolutely positive it is not understood by the American people, or they would make us stop being part of it. Let us talk about the crutch that cripples, as I call it in my legislation. Crutches usually are a temporary device, the use of which is supposed to make you well. The opposite occurs here.

The compensatory financing facility is an "unconditional entitlement" available when countries experience export income shortfalls. This compensatory financing facility window is an escape route for countries that disregard the law of supply and demand, continue to overproduce and thereby drive the price down further. This behavior hurts all producers because they, as well as we, suffer from the resulting depression level prices. My bill would require countries seeking assistance through the compensatory financing facility to take steps to bring the market into balance as a condition for receiving CFF assistance.

I have studied this issue for a long time. I am convinced that the problem facing copper today is spreading to other mining sectors such as aluminum, iron ore, phosphates, and could hit nickel or tin.

I do not think we should allow foreigners to carry away chunks of the U.S. economy using low-import prices made possible through subsidization. If that is not bad enough, some of the subsidies, the preferential financing by the World Bank and other development banks have come out of our own pocket. We have paid to have other governments export their unemployment to us. If we allow these unfairly subsidized imports it will cost us more and more jobs in more and more industries.

For background, let me talk about 1978 when the copper industry was in critical condition. The industry tried to use our trade laws and filed a section 201, escape clause action. A section 201 requires an industry to prove that imports, more than any other facor is the substantial cause of their injury. This is a difficult standard to meet, but in 1978 the copper industry proved its case and the International Trade Commission recommended a 5-year quota. President Carter, however, did not implement that recommendation and instead chose to do nothing to help the copper industry. Since then, the situation has deteriorated further.

I could tell you that since President Carter made his decision 18,000 highly skilled copper workers have lost their jobs. When the unemployment benefits ran out, they were forced to have garage sales to get enough money to move back home with their parents. The lucky ones have been able to find menial jobs. Remember, these are men with technical skills and years of experience.

I could tell you that by yearend 1982, 14 of the 25 largest U.S. mines were closed; 1983 was worse—16 were closed and U.S. copper mining capacity utilization has decreased from 78 percent in 1979 to 65 percent in 1982. At the same time capacity utilization outside the United States increased to about 82 percent.

While I am on this point, let me make it clear that it is not old mines with antiquated equipment that are sitting idle in America's copper producing regions. On the contrary, some of America's idle capacity is the best technology and most cost-effective equipment available. For example, Quintana Minerals was forced to close their Copper Flat project near Hillsboro, N. Mex., in March 1982. This was 4 months after investing $100 million in a new 15,000-ton-per-day copper mine and mill. That facility was closed before the new equipment was even broken in. I bet it closed down even before Quintana received some of the invoices on the project. The facility is for sale now, and all the jobs are gone, except for the watchman and the dog that keeps him company. The main street of the nearby town was described by the mayor as Plywood Avenue because all the stores have closed and the windows are boarded up.

Meanwhile, Chile, Peru, Panama, Brazil, Argentina have 15 copper projects they would like to open or expand by the end of the century. If they finance these like they have their other projects, it will be with the help of the World Bank and the International Finance Corporation. I do not know who these countries think will need all this new production capability.

My bill will address this problem to a certain degree.

I could tell you that since 1979 imports have increased dramatically even though demand has been decreasing. It was not until the end of last year that demand started picking up. Imports from Chile alone have risen 240 percent since 1979. from 1982 to 1983 Chilean imports increased 54 percent while U.S. production dropped almost 10 percent from the already record low levels. Because of an oversupply of copper, the price is as low, in real terms, as it was in the darkest years of the depression. At 61 cents a pound the price is below the production cost for all but a handful of producers. During 1983, for each dollar of net sales, the U.S. industry lost 16 cents.

Do you know why the price is so low? In one word, CIPIC, the Intergovernmental Council of Copper Exporting Countries. Some writers have compared CIPIC to OPEC and referred to the eight members, Chile, Zambia, Zaire, Peru, Australia, Papua, New Guinea, Yugoslavia, and Indonesia as the copper cartel. Unlike OPEC that wanted a higher price, CIPIC's present policy does not mind the lower price, but wants a bigger market share. At a time when U.S. producers were shutting down or curtailing production to bring the market more into balance, CIPIC continued a steadfast policy of maintaining production in spite of falling prices. By the end of 1982, CIPIC conceded that world consumption had fallen off throughout much of the world, and that depressed prices had caused widespread cutbacks in some nations, but CIPIC continued to support high production.

As of 1983 CIPIC has 53 percent of the Western World copper mine production; 59 percent of copper exports in the Westen World; 52 percent of the Western World reserve base of copper and 45 percent of total world reserve base copper. Clearly it has the resources to be a major influence in the copper market.

During this same time period when U.S. producers were closing down and CIPIC made its decision to increase production, the IMF passed out over $1 billion under the compensatory financing facility to six LDC clients. These six accounted for almost 50 percent of the production of copper in 1982. Five of the countries are members of CIPIC who voted to maintain and increase production. I do not think this is fair, or right and I do not think the United States should be contributing taxpayers dollars so that these countries can export their unemployment to the United States.

Let me take this one step further. The U.S. copper industry is not losing money and market share because it is not competitive. It is losing money and market share because it is not subsidized like its competitors.

Last year Chile not only overproduced but it devalued its currency by 100 percent which has the effect of cutting its production costs and then it borrowed $327 million at the IMF to cover export income shortfalls. Chile received the assistance because the price of copper is so low.

The abuses surrounding Zaire, another CIPIC member, are so sensational "60 Minutes" did an expose. President Mubuto's net worth is approximately equal to Zaire's $5 billion international debt. Copper accounts for two-thirds of the export income of that country yet Zaire has been a steady customer at the IMF and its compensatory financing facility.

The Philippines guaranteed a 75-cent-per-pound price for copper for the past few years for production at the Marinduque Mining and Industrial Corporation, which is 46 percent owned by the Philippines Government. Marinduque has been a constant cash drain on the government and has accumulated a staggering debt estimated at $1.2 billion. Marinduque would have shut down if it had not received continuous aid from the Philippine Government. Right now, the Philippines is negotiating $635 million worth or assistance at the IMF to reschedule its $24.9 billion debt.

Not all of that is attributed to the copper subsidy, but a significant portion is.

With unlimited financial support from their governments these foreign producers, Codelco, ZCCM, Gecamines, Marinduque, not only maintain production during times of world copper glut, but some actually increase production in total disregard for world supply and demand. The result is that the U.S. producers are made the marginal producers who are forced by the profit motive to operate on a month-to-month basis. This is not right and it is not fair.

I want to put the loans and other subsidies aside for a moment and look at the costs of production. U.S. production costs average 61 to 69 cents per pound. These do not compare too badly with African costs of 42 to 75 cents per pound and to Latin American costs of 43 to 56 cents. Keep in mind how much more the U.S. companies pay their employees, and remember pollution control probably adds 15 cents per pound to the production costs. If you stop and think about it, American ingenuity and know-how have kept the other production costs down to keep the U.S. companies competitive with their government-owned competitors.

On February 26, 1984, the domestic copper industry filed another section 201 case at the International Trade Commission. I am totally supportive of the case and I am hopeful that some meaningful relief will be implemented by President Reagan.

In the meantime, I feel compelled to do everything I can as a Senator to help this industry get a fair shake. We should not allow foreigners to carry away chunks of the U.S. economy using low import prices made possible through subsidization.

I do not expect this bill to solve all the problems facing the industry or to solve the problem of the compensatory financing facility, but it is a step in that direction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following materials be printed in the RECORD at this point: Statistics pertaining to copper production in the United States and copper production worldwide; a description of the bill; and the bill itself.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Description of the Bill

Use of the Compensatory Financing Facility of the Fund: The Compensatory Financing Facility makes assistance available to countries experiencing an export earnings shortfall because of falling world prices.

In 1982, for example, while the U.S. copper mines were shutting down due to lack of demand, Chile was increasing production. At the same time, the IMF passed out over $1 billion dollars to Chile and four other countries. These five accounted for almost fifty percent of the production of copper in 1982. The "entitlement" of those countries for assistance was due primarily to the low cost of copper and the resulting export income shortfall. These countries were Chile, Zambia, Zaire, Peru, and the Philippines. One significant reason for the low price was the copper glut caused by over-production by these same countries.

Under the present system these countries have been allowed to maintain, and even increase their production of copper even though there was a glut on the world market. Because of their increased production the price has remained at rock-bottom levels even though demand and consumption are up. The Compensatory Financing Facility in essence pays these countries to disregard the law of supply and demand.

The bill would require, as a condition for assistance under the Compensatory Financing Facility that these countries enter into an agreement not to add further to excess capacity and to take other necessary action to stabilize the market for the commodity.

Reporting Requirement: This section is substantially similar to an amendment offered to the IMF quota increase. It requires that the Secretary of the Treasury notify the Congress and the President every ninety days of applications filed with the various multilateral development banks for projects that would increase the capacity to produce surplus commodities like copper.

The bill also requires that Congress be notified when the primary producers of copper apply for any type of assistance at the IMF. This would allow Congress to suggest appropriate conditions that could be included in the arrangements for assistance.

Import Relief from Injury Caused by Import Competition: The standard of proof for Section 201 Trade Cases (like the one filed for copper) is higher than required by GATT.

The bill would make the U.S. law in this area consistent with GATT and at the same time make it easier for U.S. industries to prove their case and get the relief they need.

Under current law, the ITC makes a recommendation for relief. The President has total discretion. He has a wide range of trade remedies ranging from quotas, tariffs and negotiations for agreements. However, The President also has the authority to do nothing even though the industry proved its case. This is what happened to the copper industry in 1978.

The bill would require the President take some action when an industry proves its case. The bill retains all of the President's discretion except his option to do nothing.

Policy on Hard Commodities, a long term goal: When the Compensatory Financing Facility was first created, the assistance was mainly for agricultural products, the so-called soft commodities. It now covers hard commodities like copper, iron ore and other extractive metals and minerals.

The bill provides for a long term goal of removing hard commodities from the list of exports that are eligible for Compensatory Financing Facility assistance.

If this policy were implemented countries would no longer be able to ignore the law of supply and demand and have the IMF's Compensatory Financing Facility bail them out.

S. 2524

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Copper and Extractive Industries Fair Competition Act of 1984".

SURPLUS COMMODITIES

SEC. 2. The Bretton Woods Agreements Act (22 U.S.C. 286 et seq.) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"USE OF THE COMPENSATORY FINANCING FACILITY OF THE FUND

SEC. 51. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct the United States Executive Director of the Fund to present proposals to the Executive Board of the Fund at the earliest practicable time to ensure that countries experiencing a shortfall in export earnings from nonfuel, nonmetal or nonferrous metals or minerals, as determined under policies of the Fund regarding the use of its compensatory financing facility, may not borrow from the compensatory financing facility if such shortfall was produced by declining prices of a nonfuel, nonmetal or nonferrous metals or minerals commodity in surplus on world markets, unless the borrowing country enters into an agreement with the Fund to adjust production and not to add further to excess capacity and to take other necessary action to stabilize the market for such commodity.

"(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct the United States Executive Director of the Fund to vote against the provision of any loans or other financing assistance from the compensatory facility of the Fund to countries producing surplus commodities before the Executive Board completes action that would implement the provisions of subsection (a).".

REPORTING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 3. (a) Beginning 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, and at intervals of 90 days thereafter until a date 3 years after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare and transmit to the President and to the Congress a report—

(1) listing all appraisal reports which have been circulated during the preceding 90 days within the international financial institutions described in subsection (c)(2) for project assistance which would establish or enhance the capacity of any country other than the United States to produce a commodity for export, if—

(A) such commodity is in surplus on world markets or is likely to be in surplus on world markets at the time the resulting productive capacity is expected to become operative; and

(B) such assistance will cause substantial injury to United States producers of the same, similar, or competing commodity; and

(2) describing requests by any of the major copper producing countries for assistance from the International Monetary Fund.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct the representatives of the United States to the international financial institutions described in subsection (c)(2) to take into account, in their review of loans, credits, or other utilization of the resources of their respective institutions, the effect that country adjustment programs would have upon individual industry sectors and international commodity markets in order to (1) minimize any projected adverse impacts on such sectors or markets of making such loans, credits, or utilization of resources and (2) avoid wherever possible government subsidization of production and exports of international commodities without regard to economic conditions in the markets for such commodities.

(c)(1) For purposes of paragraph (2) of subsection (a), the term "major copper producing countries" refers to Chile, Indonesia, Papua New Guinea, Peru, the Philippines, Zaire, and Zambia.

(2) The international financial institutions referred to in subsections (a) and (b) are the International Monetary Fund, the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, the International Development Association, the Inter-American Development Bank, the Asian Development Bank, and the African Development Bank.

At the appropriate place in the section entitled "MILITARY ASSISTANCE" of H.J. Res. 492, add the following: No funds appropriated in this bill or other legislation shall be available for military assistance for the Government of El Salvador after May 31, 1984 unless that government has initiated a prosecution of those involved in the murder of two American Labor advisers in 1981.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to modify the amendment, amendment No. 2838.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, the amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

At the appropriate place in the section entitled "MILITARY ASSISTANCE" of H.J. Res. 492, add the following: "Not more than 85 percent of the amount made available in this legislation may be expended until the Salvadoran authorities have brought to trial and have obtained a verdict with respect to the officer or officers responsible for the murder of the two American labor advisors in January 1981.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, yesterday the U.S. Senate voted to send an additional $61.75 million in military assistance to the Government of El Salvador. Today the U.S. Senate should tell the Government of El Salvador that this assistance will not be forthcoming unless certain basic conditions are satisfied.

Yesterday the U.S. Senate voted to send more guns, more bullets, more war to El Salvador. Today the U.S. Senate should vote to send more justice.

We have been here before. We are not being asked to plow new ground. We are only being asked to live up to the principles we espoused last year.

Last year Congress made it clear that continued military assistance to El Salvador depended upon continued progress in human rights and land reform in El Salvador. Last year Congress made it part of the law that 30 percent of the $64.8 million in military assistance for fiscal year 1984 would be contingent upon the Salvadoran authorities having obtained a verdict in the case of the murdered churchwomen. Last year Congress required the President to certify that the Government of El Salvador has "made good faith efforts to investigate the murders of the seven U.S. citizens in El Salvador in December 1980 and January 1981 and to bring to justice all those responsible for those murders."

Certainly we should do no less in our deliberations today. We cannot step back from the cause of human rights and justice in El Salvador. Instead let us join together and take a step forward.

Ten days ago the Government of El Salvador released Capt. Eduard Avila. In doing that, El Salvador thumbed its nose at the people of the United States. Ten days ago the Government of El Salvador released a man who, by his own admission, provided the weapon that was used to gun down in cold blood two American labor advisers and the head of the Salvadoran land reform program. In doing that, El Salvador thumbed its nose at the Congress of the United States of America.

We have now been challenged to remain true to our principles. We have now been challenged to stand up for justice. We have not been challenged to match our words with deeds. We have now been challenged to put our money where our mouth is.

Today the U.S. Senate should work to overcome our differences about foreign policy in Central America. Today we must stand together in the name of justice. We must stand together in the name of human rights. We must stand together.

The story is a tragic one, as are so many stories of suffering and violence that continue to come out of El Salvador.

Over 3 years ago, on January 3, 1981, Michael P. Hammer and Mark David Pearlman joined a Salvadoran friend for dinner at the Sheraton Hotel in San Salvador. Mr. Hammer and Mr. Pearlman were employees of the American Institute for Free Labor Development of the AFL-CIO, and they were in El Salvador as advisers to El Salvador's land reform program. They were with Jose Rodolfo Viera, a campesino labor leader and the head of the Land Reform Institute for the Government of El Salvador. Mr. Viera had been the target of three prior attempts on his life.

As they sat together at their table drinking coffee, two gunmen came into the room with a machinegun. They walked over to their table and shot them dead. It was a brutal, premeditated, politically motivated act of cold-blooded murder.

Michael Hammer was 42 years old. Mark Pearlman was 36, and Jose Viera was 43.

What do we know about that crime today?

Because of an investigation conducted by the American Institute for Free Labor Development we know that, on that same evening, there was another dinner party being held at that same hotel. That dinner party included a part-owner of the hotel, Ricardo Sol Meza. He is a Salvadoran businessman. Accompanying Mr. Sol Meza were three members of the Salvadoran Armed Forces. There was Maj. Mario Denis Moran, a military classmate of Roberto D'Aubuisson. Major Moran was at that time head of the intelligence section of the Salvadoran National Guard. There was Lt. Isidro Lopez Sibrian. He worked in the intelligence section of the national guard. And there was Capt. Eduardo Alfonso Avila, an associate of Mr. D'Aubuisson and the nephew of one of the founders of the Arena Party. In addition, there was Mr. Sol Meza's brother-in-law, Hans Christ, a large landowner and a wealthy Salvadoran businessman.

According to the AIFLD investigation, Mr. Christ spotted the two American labor advisers and the Salvadoran labor leader as they entered the dining room of the hotel. Approximately one-half hour later, Captain Avila and Lieutenant Lopez Sibrian walked to the front of the hotel where two bodyguards were waiting. According to the AIFLD investigation, Lopez Sibrian and Eduardo Avila gave the two national guardsmen—who were serving as their bodyguards that night—a machinegun and ordered them to go into the hotel to kill the two Americans and the Salvadoran. Mr. Christ then led the two guardsmen through the hotel and pointed out the three targets. Hammer, Pearlman, and Viera were then executed.

What has happened since then?

Today, more than 3 years after those men were murdered, despite confessions and admissions and solid evidence, no one has been tried.

In April 1981, the Salvadoran Government arrested Ricardo Sol Meza and requested the extradition of Hans Christ, who had fled to Miami. In the fall of 1981, a Salvadoran judge suspended all action in the case on the grounds that there was insufficient evidence to implicate Christ and Sol Meza in the murders. That decision was upheld by a Salvadoran court of appeals in April 1982, and Sol Meza was released. An appeal of that decision is still pending before the supreme court.

As for Major Moran, he has seen service over the last 2 years in various Salvadoran embassies in South America, and he was recently brought back to El Salvador by Videas Casanova, the Defense Minister, to take charge of a command in the army.

The two national guardsmen who actually pulled the triggers are in detention. One of those two guardsmen was Major Moran's second in command in the intelligence section of the national guard. In September 1982, they confessed and, in their confession, they implicated Lieutenant Lopez Sibrian and Captain Avila.

After the national guardsmen confessed, they were remanded to a civilian court along with Lieutenant Lopez Sibrian. But in December 1982, the case against Lopez Sibrian was dismissed. The trial of the guardsmen cannot begin until appeals involving their codefendants have been resolved.

In April 1983, an appellate court upheld the dismissal of charges against Lopez Sibrian, and the case was presented to the supreme court for review. In November 1983, the supreme court denied the appeal. The case against Lopez Sibrian is over; it will not proceed unless new evidence is introduced within 1 year after the supreme court's decision.

On December 19, 1983, 3½ months ago, as a result of direct intervention by Vice President BUSH, it was announced that Captain Avila had finally been arrested by Salvadoran authorities. He was not charged with the murders of the three labor leaders but only with a minor military infraction—leaving his post without permission. And then on March 22, 1984—a mere 10 days ago—Captain Avila was suddenly released.

A spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in El Salvador has stated:

> We are convinced from early interviews in which polygraphic examinations were used that Captain Avila knows a great deal about the murders. We continue to expect the Government of El Salvador to meet its obligation to obtain that testimony.

Captain Avila is reported to have appeared in court last Saturday. It has been reported he has now denied under oath that he had anything to do with these murders. This testimony is in direct conflict with earlier statements which acknowledged his involvement in the matter.

Captain Avila's uncle is a justice of the supreme court—Dr. Ricardo Avila Morera. He is also a founder of the Arena Party.

What is the significance of all this? An editorial that appeared in this morning's Washington Post answers that question. The Post wrote:

> It's simple to understand the calculus at work here. The armed forces—which shield, if they do not actually harbor, the killers in the two American cases and in Salvadoran cases beyond counting—tend to protect their own. The national tradition and the practice of intimidation and bribery put them effectively beyond civilian political or judicial control . . . stonewalling and token concessions on the part of the Salvadorans have ensured that none of those who killed the Americans has been brought to justice. None.

This amendment, if passed, would require real progress in the prosecution of the individuals who ordered the murders of the labor advisers. This amendment follows the example set by Senator SPECTER last year. At that time, Senator SPECTER sponsored an amendment which fenced off 30 percent of the military assistance unless there was a verdict in the case of the murdered churchwomen. Ambassador Pickering has said that the Specter amendment has made a substantial contribution in promoting steady progress toward a verdict in that case. The same will be true for the case of the murdered labor advisers.

This amendment, if enacted, will withhold 15 percent of the amount we appropriated yesterday until the officer or officers responsible for these murders have been prosecuted and there has been a verdict in this case.

After the American labor advisers had been murdered in January 1981, the U.S. Embassy public affairs officer at the time stated:

> One day Mark Pearlman is giving us a briefing on agrarian reform, and the next day he's killed by these mad-dog types who are supposed to be on our side. They killed our own people, our friends, our own damned people, and what can we do about it?

Mr. President, there is something we can do about it. And we must do it today.

We have said the United States is for human rights in El Salvador. We have said that death squads must be eliminated in El Salvador. We have called for justice in El Salvador. Today we must make our deeds match our words. Today, if we pass this amendment, the actions of the U.S. Senate will speak louder than any words we could possibly say. Today if we pass this amendment, our message will be conveyed—not only in words—but also in deeds.

In the name of justice, in the name of those murdered Americans whose only sin was to work for social progress for the people of El Salvador, in the name of the people of the United States, let us tell the Government of El Salvador that these killers must be called to account. Better late than never.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? Time runs equally against both sides.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be able to proceed for 5 minutes, as if in morning business, and that whatever the situation was on the floor prior to my taking the floor be resumed after I leave the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I was to engage in a colloquy this morning with the distinguished Senator from Maine, but there was one hitch: the colloquy began on time, as the Metroliner left Wilmington, Del., without me on it. Consequently, I was unable to be here. I ask unanimous consent that the statement I am about to make appear as part of that colloquy this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Mr. BIDEN's remarks appear earlier in today's RECORD.)

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may need.

Mr. President, yesterday the Senate once again spoke in very overwhelming and bipartisan terms by virtue of its votes on two separate amendments.

Those amendments sought to reduce the emergency military assistance funding as recommended by the Inouye compromise and which the Senate adopted last Thursday. I think it is clear that the Senate now is strongly in support of the Inouye compromise figure.

New efforts to reduce or eliminate this funding will now take the form of various conditions, some of which the authors know are impossible to meet, some of which are already in effect, and others of which are simply counterproductive.

Yesterday, the senior Senator from Hawaii touched on the theme I would like to briefly emphasize today. That is that the Committee on Appropriations will not take a back seat to anyone as far as the issue of conditionality is concerned, and the Committee on Appropriations will not take a back seat to anyone in terms of our desire to press the Salvadoran Government for the needed reforms, some of which are mentioned in amendments today.

As the senior Senator from Hawaii pointed out yesterday, the very first condition was demanded by the Committee on Appropriations when it consented to the drawdown of military assistance for El Salvador during the last days of the Carter administration. Not only did the Committee on Appropriations, led by the chairman and ranking minority member of its Foreign Operations Subcommittee, initiate the first condition, with the exception of the certification process, our committee has initiated each and every term and condition related to military assistance for El Salvador. As I mentioned, the exception is the certification process, which now both friends and critics of the policy in Latin America seem to agree is a discredited mechanism.

Members will suggest that we hold back or limit assistance until the verdict is reached in the churchwomen's case. The Committee on Appropriations has already done that 4½ months ago. While I will have further to say on this matter when an amendment is proposed, it is unquestionably that legislation which forced a course of action which is now on track and where we can now see a conclusion to that horrible episode.

This amendment would condition assistance on an expeditious prosecution of those charged with the murder of the American labor leaders. The Committee on Appropriations has done that in report language. In regard to the amendment being offered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, let me briefly say that the Committee on Appropriations has been pushing for the prosecution of all who are suspected of these murders, but we have refused to set deadlines at this juncture because it could, many believe, cause prosecution of only the gunmen themselves.

Death squads? The committee has been pushing that issue as well, and, in fact, as the senior Senator from Hawaii said on the floor when he presented his compromise, one of the reasons for his recommended reduction in the administration's request was a cautious eye on all of these matters, and such reduction made clear to the Salvadoran Government that we continue in our determination that the elimination of death squads be a top priority.

Discussions between the opposing forces in El Salvador? The Committee on Appropriations, in its report which accompanied the supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1983 specifically conditioned assistance on an administration initiative with other countries in the region, the OAS, and/or international organizations to bring about unconditional discussions between the Government of El Salvador and its adversaries on the holding of free, fair and safe elections, and any other subject of concern between the parties.

I might point out that the Committee on Appropriations' action, and I believe the Senate of the United States will go along with it this week, is the first element of Congress to enact into law any part of the bipartisan Kissinger report, when we agreed to the conditionality suggested by that report and made it part of the pending legislation.

Mr. President, have the terms and conditions which the Committee on Appropriations put forward made a difference? The answer is yes. I am sure that all of us would agree that in many cases the human rights issues have not progressed as quickly as we would like, but unquestionably it is because of our insistence that they have progressed as far as they have. This is not to say that we should be satisfied, the Committee on Appropriations is satisfied or that I and the senior Senator from Hawaii are satisfed. But we have made progress, and we remain seriously concerned and genuinely resolute in our efforts on these issues. But let us not be unreasonable or counterproductive.

Mr. President, I will have more to say on each of the specific amendments as they come up, but I did want to lay on the record the position of the Committee on Appropriations on these matters, and before yielding the floor, I would like to ask the senior Senator from Hawaii if he does not share my views of what our committee has done on these issues over the years.

Mr. KENNEDY. After the Senator completes his statement, and before he makes a motion, would he yield to me?

Mr. KASTEN. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not know whether the Senator from Wisconsin had the opportunity that many of us had to talk to U.S. Ambassador Pickering when he was here last week at several briefings for Members. During those meetings, he was asked specifically whether the establishment of conditions hindered the process of carrying out justice in the case of the murdered churchwomen. He indicated at that time that "reasonable and practical," I think those were the two words he used, reasonable and practical conditions were actually welcomed.

I wonder whether the Senator from Wisconsin was aware of Ambassador Pickering's view about conditionality and whether he was familiar with the Ambassador's views about the conditions which had been placed on the military aid assistance program last year with regard to the churchwomen.

Mr. KASTEN. I would say, in response to the Senator, I was at the same meeting that he was, and I had long discussions with Ambassador Pickering and others in terms of conditionality and how it would work, and why it works in some cases, and why it might not in others. It is a very, very fine line; a difficult line.

We on the Appropriations Committee decided to follow the recommendations of conditionality of the Kissinger Commission, not necessarily the recommendations of the administration, who is opposed to any conditionality. Those are the conditions that are included in the bill. And we believe, and Ambassador Pickering believes and others believe, that these conditions are appropriate for this special emergency bill.

I believe that we have been successful in helping to reform the overall judicial system there. We have made in the report language, as the Senator, I am sure, is aware, specific reference to the labor advisers case in two of our appropriations bills so far.

Mr. KENNEDY. But not this one.

Mr. KASTEN. We are pushing, but we have not withheld the aid. I would suggest that any effort to withhold aid today is simply a vote against the level that we have agreed to; someone might argue later today with some of the other conditions, that that would be all we need. We must move forward with this emergency bill. Conditionality, in addition to what we have yet to discuss, the War Powers Act, et cetera, may very well be before this Congress at another time. I am sure it will. But today I am hopeful that we will be able to defeat efforts to add additional conditions, additional certifications, additional time delays, because I believe that we are putting maximum pressure on the Government there.

I know that the administration is opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts on this bill. I believe that what we ought to do now is recognize that the $62 million figures is the figure that the Senate has settled on, and this would in fact be a cut.

Mr. KENNEDY. If the Senator will yield further, what we are basically talking about is the murder of American citizens, in cold blood, according to confessions of those who pulled the trigger. It has been 3 years and 3 months since we have had any action, other than the arrest of the two national guardsmen. With the recent release of the prime suspect, there is little prospect for bringing to justice those that gave the order for killing Americans.

I wonder what steps the Senator from Wisconsin thinks that we should take if we are expecting to get justice for these Americans. Frankly, there is very little else we can do for those who have lost their lives in assisting the Salvadoran people. But we are voting taxpayers' money here. Families of the two labor advisers are gravely concerned. We have the failure of any serious response by the Salvadoran judicial systems. And we have had the statement of the present U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador, Ambassador Pickering, who indicated in response to questions from Members of the Senate that he believes conditions on our assistance would be useful. We hear that the administration apparently feels otherwise.

Does the Senator from Wisconsin feel that these are unreasonable restrictions or conditions to place on this appropriation?

Mr. KASTEN. In further response to the Senator—and then I intend to yield to the Senator from Texas—I would like to just say that no, the administration is every bit as opposed as the Senator is, as I am, as everyone is to the lack of progress in the judicial system in El Salvador, and we are specifically concerned about the cases of the churchwomen and the cases of labor advisers, because they involve American citizens. These conditions were included, one in the report language, one with the Specter amendment. Frankly, that was on a bill which was not of an emergency nature, that was on the regular supplemental appropriation bill; in fact, the regular bill, because the foreign operations bill was not in fact passed. That was the place for these conditions.

The Senator from Massachusetts might argue about their form. I think that the Ambassador would tell you that both have helped, and that both the churchwomen's case and the labor advisers' case are moving forward.

I am opposed to this language on this bill. When we have a 1985 authorization bill, which is presently being debated in the Foreign Relations Committee right this minute, or when we have a 1985 appropriations bill which is not of the emergency nature that this is, we might well get together on language. Hopefully, both these cases are going to be disposed of before then. But on this bill at this time, this amendment becomes a delaying mechanism, and I do not believe that we can afford to have further delay.

Mr. KENNEDY. I see my friend from Hawaii on his feet, but I would just make this point. Rather than moving forward in the cause of justice with regard to these two Americans who were killed, I would suggest that the recent action by the Salvadoran Government in releasing Mr. Avila, when there is a confession that he was the one who gave the order to assassinate these two Americans, indicates that we are moving backward. Whatever emergency exists—and that is open to debate and discussion—it just seems to me that when we are talking about Americans, when we are talking about taxpayers' money, when we are talking about the murder and the assassination of American labor advisers we ought to be able to establish some rather basic conditions of justice and human rights if we are going to provide this kind of help and assistance.

I dare say that there may be an emergency with regard to military aid and assistance, but I do not believe that claim has been established. I have attended the top-secret briefings and have listened to the statements of the Chiefs of Staff with regard to that issue. But I would say there is an emergency in El Salvador with regard to the basic system of justice, especially when we are talking about the murder of Americans.

Mr. President, I hope that this amendment will not be tabled.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Hawaii for a brief response to the Senator from Massachusetts. Following that brief response, I then yield what time he desires to the Senator from Texas. First, I yield to the Senator from Hawaii.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, once again with some sadness I find myself speaking in opposition to my dear friend from Massachusetts. This amendment, for all intents and purposes, is simply to reduce the amounts we have agreed upon by 15 percent. All of us abhor murder and assassination. That is not the issue before us.

If the American system of justice is the model system, and if that is the system on which we would compare the Salvadoran system, then I think it would be well that we review some of the available statistics. My friend from Massachusetts, as one of the ranking members of the Committee on the Judiciary, is well aware of this. Of all the murders committed in these United States, less than three-quarters result in an arrest. The most recent statistics available, those for 1982, indicate that of the 21,012 identified murders, arrests were made in only 74 percent.

Of those who committed murder in 1982, no more than 31 percent, less than one-third, were imprisoned. And of that number, 18 percent spent less than 1 year in prison.

Mr. President, in the United States, in 1982, for every 100 arrests for murder, 32 of those accused were not prosecuted. How can we hold El Salvador to a higher standard?

Mr. President, this amendment assumes that we, the officials of the United States or the Salvadorans, know who the culprits are. I have no way of knowing who the culprits are. Yet, we are now telling the authorities in El Salvador that they will have to now convene a trial and have a verdict handed down or the military assistance appropriation is going to be cut by 15 percent.

Imagine if we placed a condition such as this on the LEAA appropriations which we are funding every year and were to tell our States that, if you do not bring the murderers to the bar, none of these funds may be expended. None of the funds, Mr. President, would ever be expended. Less than one-third of those who commit murder ever find themselves placed behind bars in the United States. Nonetheless, we are telling those in El Salvador we want you to do a little better. We want you to have a 100-percent rate of arrests and we want verdicts in all cases. Therefore, much as I hate to do so, I am compelled to join my colleagues in tabling this amendment.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator from Texas may desire.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished manager of the bill.

Let me thank and congratulate the Senator from Hawaii for pointing out the practicalities and the problems that we have with this kind of amendment.

I would like to speak to a little broader issue.

Mr. President, I would like to take a few minutes of the 50 hours scheduled for this debate and attempt to explain why I think El Salvador is important and why I believe it is in our national interest to continue assistance to the government of that country.

Mr. President, a little more than a week ago there was an election in El Salvador. More than 1.4 million people went to the polls. They braved physical danger; they stood in lines for hours; they had to contend with bureaucratic inefficiency.

We all know those elections were not perfect; many people who wanted to vote were prevented from casting ballots by the insurgents or by the ineptitude of Salvadoran authorities.

But despite all these obstacles the turnout was greater than we see in an American Presidential election. The confusion was no greater than we have seen here at the D.C. Board of Elections.

I think there is general agreement, Mr. President, that the elections were fair; all parties have accepted the results. In fact, America's preferred candidate—Napoleon Durate—did very well. He got more than 43 percent of the vote.

But from the tenor of this debate you would think there had been a coup—not an election—in El Salvador. I think America should take heart from the election and from Duarte's strong showing. This is the time—this is the moment—to indicate our support for the democratic process in El Salvador. The notion that we can somehow maximize our leverage by holding back on aid until we are assured that Duarte wins the next round is absurd. It also suggests an unacceptable degree of influence in the Salvadoran elections.

I know there are Senators who do not want to provide aid at this time for El Salvador because they ask:

What if d'Aubuisson wins? What will he do with our arms and money?

Well, I do not want Robert D'Abuisson to win the run-off. But I would submit that the United States—as the champion of democracy—has an obligation to see the election process through to its conclusion. Let the people of El Salvador chose their president. If we do not like their choice, then we can reexamine our policy in the light of that reality. But for us to adopt a strategy that undermines the election process makes a mockery of everything this country stands for.

The whole purpose of our policy in Central America is to offer democracy and opportunity as alternatives to repression and injustice. We have seen two elections in El Salvador in 2 years; they were not perfect, but they were pretty good. They suggest to me that the people of El Salvador want a voice in determining their own destiny. I think the United States should move now to demonstrate our support for the elections and the democratic process. Let us keep the ball rolling. If Durate wins later this month, perhaps we will want to make even more assistance available to his government.

What I do not understand, Mr. President, is how those who want to end or reduce further or condition our aid to El Salvador feel they are fostering prospects for democracy in that country.

Will an end to assistance guarantee victory by Durate? Will it put an end to killing by left and right wing death squads? Will it put more land in the hands of the peasants? Will it insure social justice?

No; it will not. The only thing it will guarantee for sure is a military victory by the insurgents and a repudiation of the two elections that have been conducted in El Salvador.

I have never understood, Mr. President, why critics of our policy in Central America believe they staked out an exclusive claim to the moral high ground on this issue.

Critics of our policy in Central America demand that El Salvador march to our orders and make itself over in our image. They imply El Salvador must be reformed before it can be redeemed—and that reformation must be checked and monitored every step of the way by no less an authority that the U.S. Congress. They demand an end to all aid unless the Government of El Salvador begins unconditional negotiations with the forces trying to overthrow it. That Mr. President, is an extraordinary condition by any standard; it suggests a benevolent colonialism—even moral trusteeship—that is out of character for America in the latter part of the 20th century.

Mr. President, critics of our policy in Central America have no monopoly on morality. We all deplore the ravages of the death squads; we all deplore the corruption and injustice in El Salvador; we are all dismayed at the lack of progress in bringing to trial those responsible for the murder of American churchwomen and labor representatives.

The difference is that the critics see these failures of El Salvador as failures of American policy. They suggest that the United States—or our support—is somehow to blame for all this blood and injustice. I think they are wrong—seriously and dangerously wrong. I think we must be willing to accept progress even when it is not perfection. And I would submit, Mr. President, that there has been important progress in El Salvador in most of the areas of concern to critics of our policy in the region.

That progress is not as fast as we would like. It is not as steady or even as we would prefer. It will not necessarily even lead to victory for the forces of reason and democracy in the region.

But to deny the existence of progress in El Salvador is to deny the facts. It is to favor rhetoric over reality.

Take the issue of the death squads. To hear the talk on the floor of the Senate, you would think they are running rampant in El Salvador and killing everyone to the left of Robert d'Aubuisson. That, of course, is nonsense.

The fact is that El Salvador has been a massive killing ground for half a century. Terror and mayhem are endemic to the country. The United States did not spawn terrorism or death squads in El Salvador.

I do not know who is to blame for death squad murders. I have my suspicions, Mr. President—we all do. But those suspicions are difficult to prove, even when we are willing to pay $50,000 for testimony.

The United States is not responsible for the death squads; we do not condone their activities. In fact, the evidence suggests that we have leaned very hard on the Government of El Salvador to find those responsible for these outrages. We have told the Government of El Salvador, at the highest levels, that death squad activity must cease.

As far as I know, Mr. President, we have had some real success in this regard. It has been several months now since there has been a prominent murder attributed to the death squads. However, several prominent right wing politicians—three legislators, two retired officers, and now an election official—have been assassinated. We have all seen pictures of their bodies in the papers.

Where is the outcry in this body against left-wing death squads? Are we only concerned with violence from the right? Mr. President, in June 1981 more than 800 people a month were being killed by civilian violence in El Salvador. Last month, according to State Department information—that figure was down to 68.

I know there are people who scoff at our figures or official El Salvador figures—especially when they do not fit their arguments. But even the critics would have to agree that death squad activity and random violence are down—way down—in El Salvador, by whatever measure.

Some opponents of continued aid to El Salvador imply that it does not really matter who governs that country. Mr. President, I think it matters a great deal.

There was a time when isolationists would argue for a retreat to fortress America—get back behind the ocean moats and pull up the drawbridge. Mr. President, when we are talking about Central America there is no moat, there is no drawbridge—there is only Mexico.

To suggest that we should be unconcerned about Marxist expansionist governments in the hemisphere is absurd. Does it matter that Cuba is Marxist? Of course it does. I do not think America can afford to shrug its shoulders and accept whatever comes along in this world—in this hemisphere. I do not think we should be turning 5 million Salvadorans over to 11,000 insurgent supported by Nicaragua, Cuba, and the Soviet Union.

Some have argued on the floor of the Senate that we should dribble out aid to El Salvador—take it a few months at the time. They point out that there is money and supplies in the pipeline. That is true, Mr. President, but when you empty the pipeline, it takes time to fill it back up again. It takes months. It creates problems of trust and vital shortages. It creates incentives for the El Salvador military to husband resources at this critical moment before the run-off election. So I do not want to see us drain the pipeline just a few days after a successful, Democratic election in El Salvador.

I know there are people who argue for a shorter leash because there is uncertainty about who will be running El Salvador after the elections. They suspect the administration is trying to pull a fast one—to buy some insurance against a victory by D'Aubuisson.

Mr. President, I do not believe that. The administration did try to pull a fast one. They did a lousy job of it; they were caught, and they have paid the price.

The Secretary of State came before the Intelligence Committee and apologized. I accept that apology. I think it is time to judge the issue on its merits—and to follow correct Senate procedures.

The El Salvador election—the first phase of the election—is over. Duarte did well—better than many dared to imagine. He is favored in the run-off. The Democratic process will take its course.

Mr. President, I think that is progress. Free elections—even relatively free elections—are not an everyday occurrence around the world. Why would we be reacting negatively? Is it our fault that the insurgents did not want to take part in the elections? Are the people who voted—more than 1.4 million Salvadorans—to blame for rebel attacks and attempts to disrupt the process?

The critics say the FMLN did not participate in the elections because their safety could not be guaranteed. I say they ran away from popular judgment because they do not have broad popular support in El Salvador.

Despite these differences, Mr. President, there are areas in which we can all agree on Central America policy. We can agree that there is no justice in El Salvador—and that is a situation that must be corrected. The unsolved murder of the four churchwomen and the two American labor advisers is shameful; it is a scandal, and we must continue to keep up the pressure on the officials of El Salvador to reform their system of justice and bring these murderers to trial.

Equally important, we should be able to agree that Central America is a region vital to our national security.

We are spending $300 billion a year to defend America and protect our freedoms in a dangerous world. Today we are debating $63 million for El Salvador. Mr. President, that is 2 hours of our defense budget—120 minutes at the Pentagon.

Obviously, the money is not the issue. It is a matter of principle that is at stake. It is a question of how—or whether—to help a government well disposed toward the United States. How—or whether—to help that Government continue to move toward democracy and decent respect for human life.

I, for one, fail to see how we achieve our objectives by turning our back on El Salvador. I do not see how we can demand that Government undertake unconditional negotiations with an insurgent movement committed to its own destruction. I am certainly no Pollyanna about El Salvador. I have been there. I have been through the debates in the Intelligence Committee. And I have made the point over and over that we cannot win this war for them; if they lack the will they will eventually lose. If they accept terror they will lose the people.

But I think there is progress. The elections are progress. The lull in death squad activity is progress. I say let us give the new—the elected—Government in El Salvador a chance. Let us see if it can build on the progress of the past and—with the support of America—lay the foundation for a better future.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ARMSTRONG). The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am, quite frankly, amazed at the statements and comments that are made by my good friend from Texas, and even my friend from Hawaii, when they talk about unsolved murders in El Salvador and unsolved murders in the United States. We are not talking about unsolved murders, Mr. President, we are talking about organized assassination squads, whether they be from the left or the right. Anybody who knows anything about El Salvador knows that organized murder squads have been organized by the military. That is what we were talking about. We are not talking about the statistics of accidental death or crimes of passion in the United States. We are talking about two national guardsmen who admitted that Mr. Sibrian gave the order and Mr. Avila gave them the gun. And they went out and killed two Americans. That is what we are talking about.

It is interesting to listen to my colleagues, many of whom supported the invasion of Grenada in order to save American medical students at the loss of some 30 American lives. They said that that was completely justified. Now we are discussing two Americans who were killed in cold blood. We have the direct testimony about who gave the order and who gave the gun. And we are hearing these speeches about fortress America directed at those of us who support this amendment. Who mentioned that? Or that we are suddenly isolationists. Who mentioned that? Or that we are not interested in United States interests in Central America. Who mentioned that?

Of course, we are interested in it. But is there anybody in this body who believes that there is greater stability in Central America after 3 years of a guns and bullets policy? Is there anyone who believes that we are closer to the cause of social justice, equity, and democracy in Central America because we are providing more ammunition and more than $1.2 billion in economic and military aid in the last 3 years? Of course not.

Does anybody believe that we are completely out of step with the countries of the region who offer and suggest a significantly different policy? Of course we are.

But, Mr. President, it is amazing to me to hear how outrageous this suggestion to withhold 15 percent of this particular appropriation is when the law, at the current time, requires 30 percent of the previous appropriation be fenced until there is a verdict in the case involving the murder of the four American churchwomen. And not one amendment, either, from the Senator from Texas or the Senator from Hawaii or the Senator from Wisconsin to eliminate that. No amendment on these lists, no proposal that we eliminate that condition. No, no.

The President of the United States signed it. He was for that condition because of the murder of the churchwomen. But, no, we get up on our highhorses and say that we are not going to provide any kind of conditioning with regard to the murder of Americans who happened to be labor advisers and were shot down in cold blood.

Listen to what the chairman of the committee (Mr. KASTEN) wrote on March 23 of last year, to Mr. Shultz. I will read a part of the letter and will include all of it in the RECORD:

> The Committee will watch events in El Salvador closely in the coming months. When the fiscal year 1983 supplemental and the fiscal year 1984 appropriations bill come to the floor of the Senate, the Committee will decide in light of developments whether to offer amendments to reduce or eliminate funds for El Salvador. Our judgment on that issue will be determined by the progress, or lack of it, that El Salvador has made in dealing with the terms, conditions, concerns and understandings in this letter. Some of the questions which the Committee will consider in determining what action will be taken on future requests for assistance to El Salvador are as follows:
> 1. Is unlawful violence attributable to elements within the government being brought under control and are perpetrators being brought to justice under a strengthened judicial system?
> 2. Have the cases involving the American churchwomen and the American labor leaders been fairly and expeditiously prosecuted?

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have the complete letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
Washington, D.C., March 23, 1983.

Hon. GEORGE P. SHULTZ,
Secretary, Department of State,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is with reference to the various reprogramming requests pending before the Committee on Appropriations dealing with increased military ($60 million) and economic ($77.1 million) assistance for El Salvador in fiscal year 1983.

The Committee will not object to these reprogramming requests with the understanding that the administration will agree in writing to the following terms and conditions with reference to these funds and U.S. policy toward El Salvador:

1. A reaffirmation by the President, of the assurances given to the Committee in 1981, that the number of United States military advisors and trainers will not exceed 55 persons;

2. Given the inadequate functioning of the Salvadoran judicial system, the administration will begin a new and immediate effort aimed at addressing the structural defects in this system with special attention to the effective prosecution of those accused in the murders of the United States citizens;

3. The administration will begin a new and immediate diplomatic initiative aimed at securing from the Salvadoran military their guarantee of the physical security and integrity of the participants in the justice system, including justices, prosecutors, defense attorneys and witnesses;

4. The administration will take the initiative in cooperation with countries in the region, the OAS, and/or other international organizations, as appropriate, to bring about unconditional discussions between the government of El Salvador and its adversaries on the holding of free, fair and safe elections, and any other subject of concern between the parties.

In addition to the above terms and conditions, the Committee's approval of these reprogrammings is based on the understanding that the administration will seek a political solution in El Salvador. The Committee will expect the administration to pursue vigorously the regional strategy you described at Tuesday's hearing as it relates to support for democracy and the protection of human rights, support for economic development and hope for the future, and support for peaceful solutons. The Committee accepts the need to support the security of the nations of the region and to deter the "revolution without frontiers" in order to give these political, social and economic elements of your strategy a chance to succeed. As you pursue a political solution, the Committee believes a good start in that direction could be an effort to enlist other governments in the region in a common effort, in which those countries, along with the United States, would form a commission to meet as soon as possible for the purposes of seeking the eventual peaceful resolution of the conflict.

The Committee will watch events in El Salvador closely in the coming months. When the fiscal year 1983 supplemental and the fiscal year 1984 appropriations bill come to the floor of the Senate, the Committee will decide in light of developments whether to offer amendments to reduce or eliminate funds for El Salvador. Our judgment on that issue will be determined by the progress, or lack of it, that El Salvador has made in dealing with the terms, conditions, concerns and understandings in this letter. Some of the questions which the Committee will consider in determining what action will be taken on future requests for assistance to El Salvador are as follows:

1. Is unlawful violence attributable to elements within the government being brought under control and are perpetrators being brought to justice under a strengthened judicial system?

2. Have the cases involving the American churchwomen and the American labor leaders been fairly and expeditiously prosecuted?

3. Is there a functioning amnesty program, designed and being implemented in a manner that will restore to the beneficiaries a genuine opportunity to participate in Salvadoran society?

4. Have election procedures been developed that will provide practical guarantees of safety for all who wish to participate in election campaigns and to cast ballots representing their choice?

5. Are the armed forces providing an effective shield, behind which political, social and economic reforms are taking place?

Finally, the Committee wishes to state its absolute commitment to free, fair and safe democratic elections in El Salvador, and expects the administration to continue to press upon the Salvadoran government its own steadfast insistence on free and fair elections.

Sincerely,

ROBERT W. KASTEN, Jr.,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Foreign Operations.
ALFONSE M. D'AMATO,
U.S. Senate.
WARREN RUDMAN,
U.S. Senate.
ARLEN SPECTER,
U.S. Senate.
DANIEL K. INOUYE,
Ranking Minority Member, Subcommittee on Foreign Operations.
J. BENNETT JOHNSTON,
U.S. Senate.
DENNIS DECONCINI,
U.S. Senate.

Mr. KENNEDY. That letter was written over a year ago. The signature of the Senator from Wisconsin and Senator INOUYE are on that letter with specific reference to the care of the murdered labor advisers. It is just amazing to me, Mr. President, to hear on this floor that we are talking about "just murder in El Salvador; since we cannot do anything about it here in the United States, how can we expect it to be done in the El Salvador situation?"

That, Mr. President, is a logic and a reasoning that I find impossible to understand, especially when the triggermen have named in confessions those who gave the order and who gave the gun, and especially when the man who provided the gun, has confessed to that. And then he is released, 10 days ago, and, we are supposed to say that this is just a murder in El Salvador; we cannot solve murder in the downtown streets of Washington, so how are we going to solve it in El Salvador?

That is the most convoluted reasoning, Mr. President, with all due respect. I think the logic and the reasoning of my associates would have been much more believable if they had said they had offered an amendment to eliminate the conditions regarding the case of the American churchwomen. Then they would have at least logic on their side. But, oh, no, they did not touch that. But they refuse to address this particular issue.

I hope, Mr. President, that this body will be prepared to speak on that matter. If we are concerned about the cause of justice, decency, and human rights and we are concerned about American lives, before we go ahead and appropriate many more millions of dollars, we must say that we mean business when it comes to organized murder and death squads. If we do not, we are sending a very clear message, Mr. President. It is one that I certainly do not want to have any part in, or anything to do with.

Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield such time to the Senator from Connecticut as he needs. How much time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 25 minutes and 6 seconds remaining.

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield such time to the Senator from Connecticut as he may wish.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I thank my colleague for yielding.

This admonition to the Salvadoran Government, issued in December 1983 in the person of our Vice President, to control the violence and the death squads or face a reduction in American support seems almost irrelevant today. This weekend's headlines make it all too clear, I think, to many of us. While we in this body have debated the administration's request for a massive increase in military aid to El Salvador, we find the Salvadoran Army released the very principal in the 1981 murders of American labor advisers, an army captain who allegedly directed the death squads responsible for those assassinations.

Mr. President, as difficult, if not impossible, as it may be to argue that the Salvadoran Government is controlling the death squads, this administration seems prepared to do just that. At least, that is the appearance. I do not want to believe that that is the case, but at least, that is the impression one is left with, that the kind of response we see to these actions I think leaves objective people with the conclusion that there does not seem to be a strong determination to do anything about this.

Assuming that the Vice President's threat was real, and I believe it was, his words were echoed by the Secretary of State, echoed by Mr. Fred Ikle, who is with the Defense Department, two American Ambassadors, and the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights. It is almost unprecedented to have a Vice President of the country, a Secretary of State, an Assistant Secretary of Defense, two Ambassadors, and an Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights all go to the country involved and, in effect, say, "You have to stop this, you are jeopardizing the political base of support, not to mention the question of right or wrong, if this action continues." That is heavy timber to send in. These are not just some colleagues of ours in the Senate or the House, but the top-ranking officials in our Government go down and, in a very clear, unequivocal way, say that this cannot go on. In response to that, we find the very government that listened and politely accepted the message turn around and decide to let go the principal witness involved in the death of these two individuals.

How important are these two individuals? Obviously, the loss of any human life ought to be important to every single one of us. I suppose we, as Americans, take a particular interest when an American life is lost. Certainly, we have seen that in the reaction of this body and the other body, as well as the action by the President when he signed into law last year a conditionality that said that 30 percent of the military funds we would be providing this year could not be spent until the questions in the death of the four American churchwomen would be resolved. I think that is something that anyone would understand.

When your own are being subjected to that kind of treatment, you want to speak out loudly and clearly.

The tragedy is—and it is something that I am sure all of us appreciate and understand—that a Salvadoran human life is not worth any less or any more than an American life. We may not know them. They may not speak our language. They may have a different culture and a variety of other things by which we might distinguish them from us. Nonetheless, they are human beings.

Over the past 4 years, we have seen some 40,000—not soldiers, not insurgents, not people who are supporting guerrillas—40,000 men and women and children, supposedly not involved in the conflict in a direct way, who have lost their lives.

We talk about four churchwomen and two labor advisers, and obviously that brings it home to us. But just imagine if you were a Salvadoran, if you were sitting in El Salvador today, and what it must be like if your father, your husband, your wife, your mother, your brother, or your sister were decapitated, if you saw their bodies virtually brutalized—not a soldier, not an insurgent, someone innocently standing around, in effect, and that is what the bulk of these victims are.

We are not talking about soldiers who die. That is bad enough. We are talking about people who are living in a country that is being shredded.

You are not Communist, you are not a rightwing guy, you are just someone trying to live, trying to survive, and you have watched one of your family being brutalized; and you would, as a human being, like to see those responsible for that brought to the bar of justice. You would like to believe that that would be the case.

Then you see what happens when four American churchwomen and two American labor advisers are murdered; and the U.S. Government, with the full force and weight of the Vice President, the Secretary of State, the Assistant Secretary of Defense, the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights—all come to your country, screaming and demanding and hollering for justice, and nothing happens.

What do you think a Salvadoran is thinking about the likelihood of the people responsible for the death of their family members, when it comes to getting to the bar of justice, if the Vice President of the United States is unable to convince the Government of El Salvador, to which we have provided some $1.2 billion in aid, warning that that aid is going to be reduced substantially, and the Government of El Salvador, in effect, turns its back?

Why is all this important? It is important because it speaks of an embracing of fundamental values. This body, the other body, the President—God knows we have talked about this subject at great length over the past 4 years, trying to inject some sanity into a situation that seems to be anything but. But no matter how much we talk, no matter how much conditionally we offer, no matter how many amendments are adopted, it seems to me that we have to come to a realization in this body and in this country about this conflict.

The painful truth is that until the people of El Salvador decide that they are going to approach life differently, there does not seem to be much we can do about it—not the Vice President, not the Senate, not the House of Representatives.

We can adopt amendments ad nauseum. But the message is that it really does not make a lot of difference what you say or what you do—we are going to do what we darn well please to do; and that is the message. That is what is being told.

So at some point here we will have to decide whether or not we can continue to support that. I can offer amendments and my colleagues can offer amendments; but I tell my friends in this body that I do not think it is going to do a lot of good, in the final analysis, and we ultimately will have to decide, as apparently some want us to, to go in on our own, militarily, and "clean this mess up." That argument is being made not so indirectly any longer, with the choices Congress is being made to accept.

I guarantee my colleagues in this Chamber and those who may be listening in their offices that just as we heard the argument a few weeks ago, when it came to a situation in the Middle East, that even though the decision might have been bad to go in, in the first place, once you are there, you cannot get out. Frankly, I do not have much argument with those who suggested that by leaving, we hurt ourselves; that credibility suffered. I agree with that. I think our credibility did suffer as the result of redeployment. But I wish that at some point someone would raise the question as to whether the first decision was right, also. They do not seem to discuss that any longer. They want to forget that.

Some of us here argued that it did not make a lot of sense for us to be involved in Lebanon militarily. The facts have borne that out, and I do not think anyone questions that today, given the results.

All we are saying today is, let us think a little before we find ourselves in a situation like a Lebanon or a Beirut, in a place like El Salvador.

We have to ask ourselves whether or not the country to which we want to provide support—moral, financial, and political—embraces basically the same values we embrace. If they are unwilling and unable to try and to charge those responsible for the deaths of American citizens when it seems their aid depends upon it, what likelihood is there that they are going to to do anything with regard to their own people? And if they fail to do that, how long can you expect them to enjoy a base of political support in their country?

So I support the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts in trying to get some linkage here. But I tell him and I tell my colleagues that I am really not terribly optimistic about this changing things. I wish it did. I wish the President's voice and the Vice President's voice might mean something in El Salvador. But, frankly, I think they have come to the conclusion that they could do anything they want and that we are going to provide the aid. They know that no matter what the Vice President says or what others say, the United States is going to ring up the cash register and is going to send the check.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DODD. I yield.

Mr. LEAHY. In that regard, has the Senator ever seen one instance where we have threatened them with withholding unless they did a particular thing and where that has made any difference?

Mr. DODD. No, I cannot think of a single instance.

I repeat what I said a moment ago: Frankly, this amendment, I suppose, will not be adopted, given the mood that exists in this Chamber. I say that regretfully. But when you have not just a statement issued in the press, not just by the Department of State, or not just a statement issued from the White House by the President, when you have the Vice President of the United States go to a country, along with the Secretary of State, one of the top officials from the Pentagon, and one of the top officials dealing in human rights—when they go to the country involved and talk not only in general terms but also in specific terms about our concerns, and warning, in effect, that if something is not done in this regard, we will have to reduce the aid, and then have that government, those in positions of authority, virtually turn their back on those warnings, it says to me that they are convinced that it really does not make any difference.

It does not make any difference what the Vice President says. It does not make any difference what the President says. It does not make any difference what the Secretary of State says.

I will tell the Senate right now that it is not going to make any difference what this Congress says.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I agree with my friend from Connecticut, if he will yield further so I may make that point.

I have not found anything where we have done much more than bluster as far as what we expect them to do.

We have the case of the labor advisers and now a 3-year-old case, with eyewitnesses to some of the people who were involved in it. Naught comes of that.

We have the American churchwomen where I have seen the evidence put together by the FBI and others in that case, which is an open and shut case. Naught comes of that.

We saw the release on his personal recognizance this weekend of one of the people who we singled out and made an object of the U.S. concern for justice being brought. He was released in a cavalier fashion.

But I also say, look at it from the point of view of those who do not want to change in El Salvador. They know that every time we have stood up and said you either make some change or we will cut off money, we have bluffed every single time. So after a while, if they have it going the way they want it to go and getting U.S. tax dollars to boot, why should they make the changes?

I think what has happened, however, is that this is going to create the same problems that we have in Lebanon where we foolishly bluffed. Our bluff was called. We leave with U.S. policy in a shambles.

And now Central America and South America see us bluffing one more time. Our bluff will be called. The money will go down, and the American policy means very little.

That I suspect is one of the reasons why the Soviets have built up far more in Cuba during this administration than they ever dared do since the Cuban missile crisis. I think it is because they figure a lot of what comes out of the administration, comes out of Washington, has been bluff.

I appreciate the Senator's yielding to me. I spoke longer than I had intended, but I appreciate him doing that.

Mr. DODD. Not at all. I appreciate my colleague's comments.

More than 3 years have passed since Michael P. Hammer and Mark D. Pearlman were gunned down as they finished dinner in San Salvador's Sheraton Hotel. Jose Rodolfo Viera, director of El Salvador's land reform program, was murdered with them. In the months preceding their deaths, hundreds of others connected with the program had been killed. In the years since, tens of thousands of Salvadorans have been brutally murdered. There has not been one conviction. Not one trial. Not one case resolved. Not for the four American churchwomen savagely assaulted and killed in December 1980. Not for the two labor advisers. Not for the 35,000 to 40,000 Savadorans.

Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman were in El Salvador to help implement that country's fledgling land reform program, a key to improving the lot of El Salvador's campesinos. Both worked for the American Institute for Free Labor Development affiliated with the AFL-CIO. Hammer, a 17-year veteran of the institute and its director of agrarian union development, had arrived in El Salvador only hours before his death. Pearlman had been in the country for 7 months, working to overcome obstacles to the reform program in which both he and Hammer strongly believed.

As their brutal deaths graphically illustrate, the program to which they were so dedicated was violently opposed by those who felt threatened by the reform it represented—the moneyed interests, the rightwing, the generals and colonels who profited handsomely from the status quo of repression and economic injustice.

Hammer, Pearlman, and Viera were drinking coffee after a late dinner when two men sprayed them with bullets. Hammer and Viera were killed almost instantly. Pearlman died before he reached the hospital. Their killers, according to a witness, "calmly tucked their pistols into the waist of their trousers and very calmly left."

The two national guardsmen who allegedly pulled the triggers were eventually arrested, only to testify they were acting under orders issued by Salvadoran National Guard Lt. Isidro Lopez Sibrian and Salvadoran Army Capt. Eduardo Alfonso Avila. Despite the arrests, despite the testimony, there have been no trials and no convictions.

It took nearly 3 years for the Salvadoran Army to detain Avila, an action taken only days after Vice President BUSH issued his control-the-death-squads warning and then, not for the murders but for an unrelated military matter. The military charges connected with his detention are still pending, but he was released anyway. The testimony he was to give on the labor advisers' murders was never taken while he was in custody and there are serious doubts it will ever be given.

The labor advisers' case is one of thousands in El Salvador which have languished while the Salvadoran military protects the perpetrators—often its own officers and enlisted men. This is a case the Salvadoran Government is reportedly pursuing with some vigor though that seems doubtful at best. As the Washington Post pointed out in an editorial in today's paper:

It is disgusting that the Salvadorans are getting away with their pretense of pursuing the murders while everyone knows they are doing nothing.

Mr. President, this editorial appeared on Tuesday, April 3, in the Washington Post, entitled "A Witness Goes Free," referring specifically to the case of Mr. Viera.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have that editorial printed at this juncture in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A WITNESS GOES FREE

The key witness to the murder of two American land reform advisers in El Salvador in 1981 escaped the coils of the law the other day. He had been detained on an unrelated minor charge right after George Bush came to put some heat on the Salvadoran government on the matter of the despicable death squads. The two advisers, along with the four American churchwomen murdered in 1980, have been, unsurprisingly, high on the list of American concerns. It looked, last December, as though the vice president's prompting could make a difference. But now the man Americans believe helped plan the 1981 killings, meeting with one gunman minutes before the crime and lending a windbreaker to conceal the murder weapon, is free.

It's simple to understand the calculus at work here. The armed forces—which shield, if they do not actually harbor, the killers in the two American cases and in Salvadoran cases beyond counting—tend to protect their own. The national tradition and the practice of intimidation and bribery put them effectively beyond civilian political or judicial control. The military sees the reluctance even of most of President Reagan's critics to cut off El Salvador because of the death squads. It recalls that at crucial moments the United States has flinched—as when, for example, the White House overruled Ambassador Deane Hinton's protests. Stonewalling and token concessions on the part of the Salvadorans have ensured that none of those who killed the Americans has been brought to justice. None.

Looking for a way to put heat on the Salvadoran military, Congress last year withheld some of the military aid it had voted, conditioning full delivery on Salvadoran performance in the American cases. The administration then abandoned in practice the fiction of the independence of the Salvadoran judicial system, and began applying heavy political pressure, including the Bush mission. A year later, however, Salvador is releasing witnesses, and the administration is asking for new emergency aid.

How can this be? Why should Ronald Reagan not tell the new Salvadoran president that one matter must be disposed of before any other can be addressed. Such an unambiguous presidential commitment would be something new. It is disgusting that the Salvadorans are getting away with their pretense of pursuing the murderers while everyone knows they are doing nothing. Ronald Reagan was supposed to be the kind of president—at least so he said—who wouldn't put up with this sort of thing.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, the labor advisers' case is one in which we must be especially concerned because, as with the case surrounding the murders of the four American churchwomen, American citizens were involved. But at the same time we cannot lose sight of the thousands of other innocent victims whose deaths have gone unanswered. There have been no trials. There has not been one conviction.

Mr. President, let me just say in conclusion, as to the case being made by the Senator from Massachusetts with his amendment, I think it is important that our colleagues realize here that this amendment is merely an expression on the part of this body to try and bring some sanity in that country, and I only wish it would. I am not optimistic about it, given the recent past events.

My only hope would be as we get sometimes, I think, caught up in dealing with specific amendments, we do not lose sight of the larger picture and the larger issue which is at stake here, and that is ultimately whether or not the Government of El Salvador is going to take the necessary steps to rebuild confidence in its own country and to get about the business of trying to bring an end to that violence and to the war in that nation so that it can be at least a safe environment for economic aid and assistance.

And it seems too often we get to arguing numbers here rather than the overall broad policy questions. I suspect that is what we are sort of caught up in a bit this week, that we are going to lose sight of the forest for the trees in some way.

But this amendment I think will give this body at least a chance to express itself to some degree of consistency on the issue of the death squads as they pertain particularly to two Americans and one Salvadoran. By the way, there was an El Salvadoran, who was assassinated that evening as well along with Mr. Pearlman, Mr. Hammer. Mr. Jose Rodolfo Viera, who was director of El Salvador's land reform program, was also murdered that evening in the hotel.

It just might send, in addition to the other signals as, we call them, an indication of where this body stands at least on this issue, if not on the issue of continuation of the conflict in combat and the likelihood of U.S. military involvement in a direct way. Maybe this will help.

So for that reason, Mr. President, I will support this amendment.

I yield.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I am voting in favor of tabling this amendment because I believe it significantly diffuses the focus of attention from the efforts to limit 30 percent of the funding for El Salvador until there is a verdict on the national guardsmen who are defendants in the case involving the four U.S. churchwomen. On the fiscal year 1984 appropriations bill, I added such an amendment limiting 30 percent of an appropriation of approximately $64 million until there was a verdict in that case. Representatives of the U.S. State Department and members of the Salvadoran Government concede that the 30 percent limitation has been effective in pushing the nuns' case ahead for trial.

The case involved in this amendment, known as the Sheraton murder case, involves much more complicated issues of law. For example, the two gunmen cannot testify against the key prospective military defendant because of Salvadoran law which prohibits one coconspirator testifying against another coconspirator. Under our principles of law, such a coconspirator can testify against another coconspirator.

The so-called Sheraton case is now on appeal from one El Salvadoran appellate court to a higher El Salvadoran appellate court. All factors considered, the procedural snarl and the differences in law make the so-called Sheraton military case a much more difficult case to use to impose conditionality on U.S. aid to El Salvador.

It is my judgment, that the nuns' case has the best chance of motivating the El Salvadoran judicial system and that the source of attention should remain on that case for the reasons I have discussed.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I have no further need for time and I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

I wonder if the Senator from Connecticut on behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts will yield back the remainder of the time.

Mr. DODD. If the Senator will withhold a minute, I might just suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield back his time?

Mr. KASTEN. I will defer that request until later.

Mr. DODD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the clerk calls the roll, the Chair inquires of the Senator from Connecticut on whose time the quorum call is to be charged.

Mr. DODD. It would be with the chairman's consent equally divided.

Mr. KASTEN. Call the quorum on the Senator's time.

Mr. DODD. I ask unanimous consent that it be shared equally.

Mr. INOUYE. Take it out of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request that the time of the quorum be shared equally?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, there are no further requests for time on this side, so we yield back whatever time we have remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time is yielded back.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time is yielded back.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent on official business.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. SASSER) and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) and the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPECTER). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 69, nays 24, as follows:

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOLDWATER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2881

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER) proposes an amendment numbered 2881.

On page 3, line 10, after "further," insert the following:

That no more than 70 percent of this or any subsequent supplemental appropriation for military assistance to El Salvador during fiscal year 1984 may be obligated or expended until Salvadoran authorities have brought the National Guardsmen charged with murder in the deaths of four United States churchwomen to trial and have obtained a verdict.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I offer this amendment, which, as has been read by the clerk, simply stated, provides that 30 percent of the aid to El Salvador under this supplemental appropriations bill will be withheld until there has been a verdict in the case involving the murders of the four U.S. churchwomen. In offering this amendment, I do so because of the egregious and outlandish miscarriage of justice in El Salvador and the failure of El Salvador to bring this case to trial since December 2, 1980, and because the law of the land has already been established in the appropriations bill for fiscal year 1984 that some 30 percent of the appropriations for El Salvador would be withheld pending a verdict in this case.

This method was designed as a means of motivating the El Salvador judicial system to do something about this case as a representative case of the miscarriage of justice and the failure to accord basic human rights in El Salvador, which is the state of events which has continued for many years.

In seeking a supplemental appropriation as the administration has done, now pegged at some $61 million, the effect is to circumvent the law which was established in the withholding of 30 percent of the previous appropriation of some $64 million, 30 percent being slightly less than $20 million. It is my submission to this body that we simply cannot ignore the failure of the Salvadoran officials to try this case and ignore the penalty which the Congress and the President established—because the President signed the bill approved by the Congress—which the law of the land has established as the penalty for El Salvador for not trying this case. It is most inappropriate and wrong to simply come back and under the label of an emergency appropriations say, "Let us put forth $60 million more to El Salvador."

Had this case gone to verdict, some $20 million would have been liberated and it would not now be necessary to have $61 million in emergency, but $20 million from $61 million would be $41 million in emergency aid.

So in using the vehicle of an emergency supplemental, the considered judgment of the U.S. Congress and the considered judgment of the President in signing the bill submitted by the U.S. Congress are, simply stated, being thwarted.

At the same time that this 30-percent limitation was imposed in an amendment which I submitted on the fiscal year 1984 appropriations bill, there was a companion provision calling upon the El Salvador judicial system to utilize $3 million earmarked to expedite the administration of criminal justice in El Salvador for citizens of El Salvador and for victims of a failing justice system, victims who did not happen to be U.S. citizens.

It was the judgment of the Congress that the Salvadoran judicial system had failed, not only as to the nuns case but as to the administration of justice generally. That is why we withheld 30 percent until the nuns case is tried; that is why we earmarked some $3 million for the administration of justice generally in a judicial system which had been characterized by death squad activities, by a law which allowed for prolonged detention of people without trial and without bail. I am sorry to report that, from all indications, the $3 million earmarked has not been utilized as directed by the Congress in a law signed by the President of the United States just as the case involving the nuns has not yet been tried.

Mr. President, it had been my intention to submit an amendment for the consideration of this body which would have substantially revised the judicial system in El Salvadaor to provide a more effective procedure to see to it that justice would be done in El Salvador, with particular reference to the so-called death squad cases. This Senator had intended to submit an amendment which would have called for the creation of a special unit to combat murders by death squads.

Mr. President, how much time do I have at the present time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 9 minutes and 30 seconds.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair.

That amendment to establish a special unit to combat murders by death squads would have required a compliment of some 20 investigators and not fewer than 10 prosecutors at the outset and, later, a ratio of 1 investigator for every 10 cases and 1 prosecutor for every 20 cases.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of a statement which I had prepared for submission be printed in the RECORD as if read in full at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the amendment I prepared would restrict 50 percent of the amount made available in this appropriation for military assistance to El Salvador until the Salvadoran authorities achieve certain specified, objective benchmarks designed to insure vigorous investigation and prosecution of death squad and extremist murders. I ask unanimous consent that the full text of this amendment be printed in the RECORD at this point.

It is my judgment, after reviewing carefully the administration's supplemental request that El Salvador, that there is a real and immediate need for some additional military assistance. I believe that Congress should be responsive to the President's request. The elections conducted in El Salvador this past Sunday inspire hope for true and lasting democratic reform.

The United States should continue to support this effort.

I remain deeply troubled, however, by flagrant violations of human rights in El Salvador. The January 16, 1984, "Report on the Situation in El Salvador," issued by the Department of State, cites a significant increase, in 1983, in death squad activity against prominent individuals, especially academics and labor leaders. According to Tutela Legal, the human rights office of the archdiocese of San Salvador, the total number of civilians killed in the last 6 months by the Army, security forces, and paramilitary squads allied with them was 2,615. According to the archdiocese, this number represents an increase over the first 6-month period of 1983, and a still larger increase over the last 6 months of 1982.

During consideration of the fiscal year 1984 appropriations bill last fall, I introduced an amendment to restrict 30 percent of the U.S. military assistance to El Salvador until the National Guardsmen charged with murder in the deaths of four U.S. churchwomen were brought to trial and a verdict was obtained. This amendment passed both Houses and was signed into law. I have remained in close consultation with the State Department on the case of the murdered churchwomen, and have been informed by administration officials working with the El Salvadorans on this issue that my amendment to restrict 30 percent of aid is responsible for marked progress in that case.

When the emergency supplemental request for El Salvador came before the Appropriations Committee earlier this month, I introduced the amendment I am describing here today to attach even stiffer conditions to U.S. military assistance for El Salvador, as leverage to compel progress in human rights. The amendment failed in full committee.

It remains my firm belief that some percentage of U.S. assistance should be conditioned upon real progress in addressing the death squads in El Salvador. I know, from conversations with many of my colleagues here in the Senate and with the State Department and other administration officials, that there is strong support for this general approach. However, despite repeated efforts, we have been unable to reach a consensus on the precise form such conditions should take. Thus, with great reluctance, I am not going to offer this amendment and propose in its place an amendment to continue the effect of my successful amendment to restrict 30 percent of the appropriation for military assistance for El Salvador until Salvadoran authorities have brought the National Guardsmen charged with murder in the deaths of four U.S. churchwomen to trial and have obtained a verdict.

Without this amendment, the objective endorsed by this body will be severely undermined. While significant progress has been made in the churchwomen's case, it still has not gone to trial. The time for pontification has long since passed; the time for progress is present. We must act now to convey to El Salvador our clear, concrete conviction that Congress cannot continue to condone, directly or indirectly, these clear violations of human rights. We must draw the line somewhere, sometime. I urge my colleagues to draw it here, now.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT—SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION FOR EL SALVADOR

At the end of the appropriation for El Salvador, add:

"Section . Restrictions on Expenditure

No funds appropriated in this supplemental appropriation for aid to El Salvador for Fiscal Year 1984 may be expended unless:

1. The Government of El Salvador establishes a special unit to combat murders by death squads and such unit actively investigates every such homicide immediately, fully, and vigorously and prosecutes resulting cases to the full extent of the law of El Salvador, as set forth below:

(a) The unit shall be established under the authority and supervision of the Supreme Court; shall commence operations within 30 days of enactment of this supplemental appropriation; shall consist of not fewer than 20 investigators and not fewer than 10 prosecutors; and shall increase in size, if necessary, to maintain a ratio of one investigator for every 10 cases and one prosecutor for every 20 cases;

(b) Evidence establishing a prima facie case shall be submitted to the Supreme Court of El Salvador within five calendar days after such a case has been completed;

(c) Immediately upon establishment, the unit shall make and report to the Supreme Court an inventory of all unsolved death squad homicides and every 30 days thereafter shall make and forward to the Supreme Court a status report on each open investigation and a tabulation for the period of new investigations initiated, investigations closed without judicial action and investigations referred for prosecution.

(d) Within 60 days of enactment of this supplemental appropriation, the unit shall conduct an evaluation and report to the Supreme Court as to the adequacy of its number of investigators and prosecutors, and the Supreme Court shall secure such personnel as may be necessary in excess of the ratios set forth above; and the Supreme Court shall also decide on the number of support personnel required at any time to carry out the work of the unit.

(e) Every 30 days there shall be a public report on the number of murders committed in the previous 30 days, the number of investigations initiated, the number of investigations remaining open, the number closed, and the number referred for prosecution;

(f) The unit shall also be responsible for providing any necessary protection to judges, jurors, witnesses or other participants in death squad murder cases;

(g) The unit shall also take prompt steps to develop forensic laboratory services and other necessary means for conducting identification, polygraph, psychological and other investigative support services.

2. The operations of the special unit shall have no effect whatsoever on the authority and responsibility of the courts of El Salvador which shall conduct judicial investigations and trials in all cases as provided by the law of El Salvador.

3. Pending efforts by the Government of El Salvador to establish forensic laboratory and investigative support services, the FBI shall, notwithstanding any other provision of the law, be authorized for a period of up to six months to provide such investigative support services to the unit; and the United States Marshal Services, likewise, shall be authorized to provide equipment, training and support for judicial protection.

4. The Department of State shall administer the monitoring of compliance with the conditions established herein and shall report to the President and the Congress on or before the 10th of each month and such report shall contain specific facts, figures and dates corresponding to the conditions established herein.

5. The Secretary of State shall have authority to extend time limits established by this section for 20 days upon his conclusion that the Government of El Salvador has made every realistic effort to meet the conditions and compliance with them was not possible and may extend such periods by an additional 20 days, provided that the Secretary must file with the Appropriations and Foreign Relations Committees of the House of Representatives and of the Senate a statement of his further extension and the reasons therefor, which shall take effect unless superseded by appropriate action of the Committee as in the case of reprogramming; and further the Secretary of State shall report within 60 days of the enactment of this supplemental appropriation as to whether the conditions have been met and whether there is good reason to consider modifying them.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I had submitted that same amendment before the Committee on Appropriations, which amendment had been submitted in approximately that form after this Senator was unable to come to an agreement with the Department of State on a mode of revising the El Salvador judicial system. The State Department had been quite cooperative in conversations which this Senator had with Under Secretary of State Kenneth Dam and with Mr. James Michel and we had come very close to an arrangement of a revision of the El Salvador judicial system as a condition for funds. At this time, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of an amendment which had been submitted by the Department of State be printed on the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT

Provided: That none of the funds appropriated in this or any subsequent supplemental appropriation for military assistance to El Salvador during the fiscal year 1984 may continue to be obligated or expended unless,

not later than sixty days after the enactment of this Act, the President reports to the Congress that effective institutions have been established and are operating within the criminal justice system of El Salvador for the professional investigation of crimes of extremist violence and for the protection of judges, jurors, witnesses and other participants in judicial proceedings under organizational arrangements and operating procedures which assure that the performance of investigative and protective functions—

(1) contributes to the strengthening of an independent judiciary capable of supervising the investigative process and carrying out its duties without fear of intimidation;

(2) receives sufficient resources to provide a manageable workload for investigators, prosecutors and judges, thereby providing an effective deterrent to extremist violence;

(3) is accompanied by the maintenance of adequate records and reports to enable informed monitoring and assessment of performance; and

(4) has available adequate forensic laboratory facilities and a program of professional training to enable the use of modern and scientific investigative methods.

COMMITTEE REPORT

The creation of a fair and effective criminal justice system in El Salvador is essential if that country is to curb extremist violence, secure human rights and achieve true democracy. Providing for more effective criminal investigations and in creating a means for physical protection of participants in sensitive judicial cases are crucial steps. Yet, progress has been frustratingly slow and inadequate. The Committee has therefore established a firm deadline for the Salvadoran Government to carry out these urgent objectives. No military assistance appropriated by this or any subsequent supplemental appropriation in fiscal year 1984 can be furnished sixty days after enactment of this supplemental appropriations bill unless the President reports that effective institutions have been established and are actually performing an investigative and protective functions in a competent and professional manner, and which meet four specified objectives.

The Committee intends that for the objectives specified in the legislation to be met the President must find that the following criteria have all been achieved:

INVESTIGATIVE UNIT

(a) The supervision of the investigative unit must include the participation of the Supreme Court and the Attorney General of El Salvador;

(b) The initial staff of investigators must be recruited and the unit formally established by March 31;

(c) Recruitment of initial legal, clerical and technical staff must be accomplished by April 15 (recognizing that technical positions may be intially staffed with trainees);

(d) By April 15, the acquisition of initial stocks of equipment and supplies, and the development of operational, record-keeping and reporting procedures must be completed;

(e) Training of the first class of investigators must be completed by May 1, and the unit will then become fully operational;

(f) There must be an adequate ratio of investigators and prosecutors to the number of pending cases so that no investigator has more than 10 cases and no prosecutor has more than 20 cases active at any one time, and in any event there will be no less than 20 investigators on the permanent staff;

(g) Evidence establishing a case against known individuals shall be promptly submitted to the appropriate court of competent jurisdiction of El Salvador, within the time limits prescribed by law;

(h) The unit will maintain statistics on the number of reported death squad and extremist murders during each reporting period, the number of cases under investigation and their current status, and the disposition of cases by the unit and the courts, including cases closed without judicial action and investigations referred for prosecution; these statistics will be made available to the United States and included as available in the report to be furnished within 60 days after enactment of this Act and periodically reported by the Department of State to the Committee thereafter as the Committee may request;

(i) The unit must take prompt steps to develop forensic laboratory services and other necessary means for conducting identification, polygraph, psychological and other investigative support services, within its own resources or in conjunction with other agencies.

PROTECTIVE UNIT

(a) This unit shall be responsible for providing any necessary protection to judges, jurors, witnessess, or any other participants in sensitive judicial proceedings;

(b) The work of this unit will be coordinated with that of the investigative unit;

(c) This unit will be created and become operational by May 1; to the extent possible, it will provide earlier necessary protective services in connection with the final stage of the churchwomen's case;

The Committee requires that the Department of State promptly consult with the Committee in the event any of these objectives should fail to be implemented or otherwise requires review and possible adaptation in light of events.

Mr. SPECTER. This amendment was unsatisfactory, Mr. President, to this Senator because of some differences between the State Department proposed amendment and the one which this Senator had proposed in the Appropriations Committee and also because the State Department proposal carried with it substantial language in the committee report as opposed to in the body of the amendment itself. I have asked that this approach be printed in the RECORD so that the record may be plain as to the alternative method which this Senator has sought beyond the restriction of some 30 percent of the funds.

The reason that the amendment did not pass in the Committee on Appropriations, in my judgment, was that it was too elaborate and there was not sufficient time for study of all of the details which were involved. That is one of the great difficulties of conditionality in this field. The condition of a verdict lends itself so admirably to having a clear-cut event which permits a cutoff of funds or permits a release of funds. It is my view that the case involving the nuns is one uniquely qualified for this kind of condition in the context of the chronology of this case.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the chronology of the nuns case be printed in the RECORD as if read in full.

There being no objection, the chronology was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that the text of a letter from this Senator to Secretary of State George Shultz, dated August 26, 1983, be printed in the RECORD. This letter has already been made a part of the record in the Appropriations Committee and it sets forth in some detail the thinking of this Senator on the failures of the Salvadoran judicial system to bring this case to trial.

There being no objection, the letter was orderd to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., August 26, 1983.

Hon. GEORGE SHULTZ,
Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am writing to you immediately upon my return from Central America because I believe that foreign aid to El Salvador will be in jeopardy for FY 1984 unless El Salvador's government takes prompt action on the human rights issue on the nuns' case specifically and judicial reform generally.

Notwithstanding repeated requests, the El Salvadoran Attorney General has not acted to complete the investigation of the nuns' case, raising a serious question on the allegations of cover-up and involvement of higher officials in the National Guard.

I personally reviewed the case with Salvadoran officials including Attorney General Rivera and President Magana on May 13-15, 1983 in San Salvador; with President Magana on June 16, 1983, in Washington, D.C.; and with Attorney General Rivera and President Magana in San Salvador last Monday, August 22. In addition, U.S. Embassy officials in El Salvadora and attorneys for the victims' families have made specific requests which have gone unheeded.

While some delay resulted from requests for additional investigation by attorneys for the victims' families early this summer, Attorney General Rivera has not acted for some six weeks on important requests in a letter dated July 8, 1983 from U.S. Embassy officials in El Salvador. That letter requested interviews with eight Salvadoran guardsmen on allegations that the nuns had been detained at the airport on "higher orders" and that "Higher officials" ordered the murders.

When I asked Mr. Rivera why that investigation had not been completed during the intervening weeks, he said he would do it "manana" (one word I did not need translated) and further said that he had not gotten to it because of other work on the case.

Another issue in that July 8 letter, which has not been pursued, involved a request that fingerprints on a threatening letter sent to the nuns be compared with fingerprints of certain National Guardsmen. By affidavit dated January 11, 1983 of William P. Ford, brother of the murdered Ita Ford, which was made part of the record before Judge Rauda, the Attorney General's office and the court were specifically advised of important evidence of the possible involvement of others and requested to investigatively pursue such evidentiary items. They include a death threat sign found tacked to the door of the church in Chalatenango where two of the nuns worked which bears eight distinct set of fingerprints, and the van in which the murdered women were abducted while departing from the International Airport on December 2, 1980, which bears 12 distinct sets of fingerprints that have not yet been identified (in addition to those of Colindres Aleman which have). The Salvadoran Government has supplied the FBI only with the fingerprints of the six guardsmen originally charged in this case. They do not match the aforementioned fingerprints on the threat sign or van. These fingerprints might match those of members of the security contingent based in Chalatenango (in the case of the sign) and the various security forces based at the airport (in the case of the van).

In addition to the death threat sign, members of the Chalatenango parish staff on two separate occasions on the very day the Churchwomen were murdered received threatening communications. One letter was signed by a person identifying himself as Roberto Fogelbach Perez, "Coordinator of the Anticommunist Front." The other communication contained a list of names including those of Sisters Ford and Clarke and virtually all other members of the parish staff. The unidentified bearer of this list said, "Here is a list of the people we are going to kill—and today, this very night, we will begin." Apparently, no effort was ever made to identify this individual or on whose behalf he was speaking in using the word "we." Similarly, Salvadoran authorities have refused to investigate the group endorsing the sign found tacked to the parish door which said "Any one who enters this house will die." The sign, found less than a month before the murders, was from a group calling themselves the Mauricio Borgonovo Anticommunist Brigade. Nor was Fogelbach Perez investigated.

With regard to indications of a cover-up, Salvadoran authorities refused to investigate the assertion made by Colindres Aleman's immediate superior, Sergeant Martinez, to the FBI in February 1982 that seven days after the murder Colindres Aleman confessed to him. Sergeant Martinez apparently alleged that he did not report the confession to any of his superiors even though it was made at a meeting called by the National Guard Commander on December 9, 1980 in which the Commander said he had reason to believe that guardsmen had been involved in murdering the four Churchwomen. The Commander, now Defense Minister Vides Casanova, summoned personnel from the airport security forces to detemine information about guard involvement in the murders. It is questionable, given those circumstances, that Sergeant Martinez would not have reported the confession by Colindres Aleman. In my judgment, Sergeant Martinez, who was recently deposed before Judge Rauda only after insistence by the State Department confirmed in its letter on July 8, should be polygraphed on this issue of reporting the confession. As with the fingerprints, Salvadoran authorities limited the polygraph examinations, which were conducted at its request by the FBI, to the six guardsmen originally arrested for these murders.

In addition, the Salvadoran prosecutors should obviously investigate the telephone call at the airport in which a guardsmen was overheard only hours prior to the abduction of the Churchwomen saying "No, she didn't arrive on the flight. We'll have to wait for the next." In fact, while expected on an earlier flight from Nicaragua, where the Maryknoll order had its annual conference, Sisters Ford and Clarke arrived instead on the later flight.

On the issue of danger to or intimidation of the trial judge, I find it inexplicable that Judge Rauda has not been given personal protection. As you recall, I suggested this in a letter to you some time ago. In view of the failure to provide Judge Rauda with bodyguards, it may be unsurprising that he has shown as little interest as the Attorney General in pursuing leads of superior orders or cover-up. Thus, in January he told the lawyers for the family he did not intend to pursue the issue of superior orders even as a topic of questioning for witnesses, such as Sergeant Martinez, whose testimony was needed against the five enlisted guardsmen.

It is ironic that another reason cited for arbitrarily limiting the scope of the judicial investigation is that it is predicated on the National Guard investigation. That investigation, of course, neglected to pursue leads of superior orders or cover-up. Really, the two issues, though, are closely related. Thus, the National Guard officers and Civil Guard officers summoned by a villager who discovered the four bodies in a roadside ditch ordered the local Justice of the Peace to authorize immediate burial without identification, autopsy or investigation. He did so even though the bodies which were mostly undressed, badly bruised and dirt-covered and bearing gunshot wounds to the head, were, as the villager described them, the remains of "blond foreigners." Any notion that efforts to identify the bodies would be futile is unsupportable.

On both the issues of superior orders and cover-up, it appears that the Commission that received the results of FBI investigation in early 1981 neglected to forward much of the evidence to the Attorney General and Judge Rauda. This failure may explain why, for example, the prosecutors advised the families' lawyers they were unaware of the threat sign with the 8 sets of fingerprints until June 1983 when embassy officials told them about it.

Some aspects of their ignorance, however, cannot be easily explained. For example, the prosecutors reportedly were unaware of Guardsman Valle's deposition that Colindres Aleman told him he was acting on "Superior orders" in apprehending the four women. This deposition was taken after the prosecutors took charge of the case and is part of the official court record. So is Mr. Ford's affidavit of January, 1983, parts of which they also seemed unfamiliar with as of July, according to the families' lawyers.

In the face of that dereliction in completing the investigation, the suspicion inevitably arises that there may be substance to the charges of cover-up or involvement of high officials.

As you know from the hearings last March 22, many members of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee regarded the nuns' case as pivotal on whether the El Salvadoran government was proceeding adequately on the human rights issue. Given the current status of the record, this case could be determinative in some or many members voting against aid for El Salvador.

In addition to specific cases (of which the nuns' case was only one), the El Salvadoran government has made commitments to proceed immediately with a Judicial Reform Commission when I met with President Magana and other officials last May. In June in Washington, D.C., President Magana spoke in the same vein. Nonetheless, months have passed without any concrete action.

Last Friday, August 19, I was advised by Mr. James Michel of the State Department that El Salvador officials has said the Commission would be acted upon that day in advance of my arrival on Monday. While the Judicial Reform Commission has still not been appointed, Mr. Francisco Jose Guerrero, Minister of the Presidency, handed U.S. Embassy officials in El Salvador a letter on Monday responding to a letter from Mr. Michel dated June 9, 1983 concerning the Judicial Reform Commission. Even that letter would most probably not have been written without the pressure of my trip to El Salvador.

In light of the failure of the El Salvador judicial system to administer even the most rudimentary form of justice in thousands of cases including the local citizenry, the Congress may reject further aid due to the failure of Salvadoran officials to appoint a Judicial Reform Commission and at least begin to act on its recommendations.

I fully understand the difficulty which you and your Department face in securing timely and adequate action by Salvadoran officials; but I call these matters to your personal attention because of my own efforts and experience, and because these issues could be determinative on the important issue of further foreign aid to El Salvador.

So that our Embassy officials, who have been so cooperative and helpful on my trips to El Salvador, will be fully informed on my findings, I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Ken Bleakley, the Chargé there since Ambassador Pickering has not yet arrived there.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, there is absolutely no reason why this case has not been brought to trial long ago. This case is different from the case embodied in the amendment just presented by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the so-called Sheraton case, where two U.S. labor leaders were murdered, and this Senator had looked into that case in some detail. It is a very complicated matter and the Salvadorans made representations of inability to bring that case to trial because of differences between their judicial system and ours. For example, the alleged ringleader or director of that murder could not be testified against by the two triggermen under El Salvadoran law, which prohibits a coconspirator from testifying against a coconspirator. That is alien to U.S. principles of law, where frequently, one of a conspiracy will testify against others in a conspiracy. But, according to Salvadoran law as reported to me by experts there, that could not be done.

The case is a complex one, where it has been dismissed by an appellate court and there is an appeal pending from an intermediate appellate court to the Supreme Court of El Salvador on a procedural issue which, as explained to me, has very little chance of being granted. Unlike the case involving the four American churchwomen, the case involving the Sheraton murders gives much more of at least the appearance of excuse by the Salvadoran officials.

In voting to table the amendment by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts on the case involving the Sheraton murders, it was my view that the amendment diluted the effort to at least bring pressure on the Salvdoran officials to bring to trial the case involving the four American churchwomen. It is a clear-cut case where there is absolutely no excuse for not bringing the case to trial at the earliest possible time, long before this date. Representations have been made to me that the case involving the four American churchwomen can be tried during the month of April. Those representations have been made by members of the Department of State.

Knowing the way that even an emergency appropriations bill winds its way through this body, through the House of Representatives, and through conference, it may well be a protracted period of time before the funds are ready to be expended in any event. It has been reported to me by a number of people, including my colleagues in the Senate, who have been in El Salvador recently, that the amendment which limited 30 percent of the fiscal year 1984 appropriations has been a material inducement, real pressure, on El Salvador to bring the nun's case to trial.

If we simply appropriate an additional $61 million without this kind of limitation, it is an open invitation to El Salvador not to bring this case to trial. It is an open declaration to El Salvador that they do not have to pay any attention to the Congress of the United States or to the laws of the United States, which say that $20 million will be withheld unless you bring a case to trial because, if you do not bring a case to trial, there will be an emergency, something will arise, and the United States of America will come and bail you out for some other reason.

As a minimal condition to this appropriations bill, it is my firm conviction that the 30-percent limitation which has been the law ought to be applied to this $61 million as well.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, Senator HEINZ, be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, yesterday, a majority of my colleagues voted for the whole $62 million——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Who is in charge of the time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time is controlled by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Wisconsin, on the amendment.

Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I do not know whether the Senator from Vermont wants to speak in favor of or in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I know that the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Connecticut are going to offer a second-degree amendment.

Prior to that time, I should like to have 3 or 4 minutes from the Senator from Pennsylvania to speak in favor of the Senator's amendment, and I will be glad to do it any time the Senator desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 1 minute remaining on the amendment.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I would be delighted to yield the Senator the remaining time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 4 minutes on the bill, if I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I hope that the Senate of the United States, at a very minimum, would go on record in support of the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania. After all, this body, the House of Representatives, and the President of the United States supported that position a number of months ago.

It seems to me that if we do not accept the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, what we are saying is that we fenced last year's money; but since El Salvador did not get that money, we are going to add more money this year to make up for it. That will be the net result. El Salvador did not get the 20-odd million dollars fenced off, and now we are put in the position where we are being asked to expedite more money for military purposes in El Salvador.

What the Senator from Pennsylvania is really asking, as I understand it, is that we just reaffirm current law. That seems to me to be a very compelling argument in support of the Senator from Pennsylvania. He is really asking us to reaffirm what we already have done in the Senate and in the House, for the very reasons he has outlined here—because of the failure of the judicial system in El Salvador to come to a verdict on one of the most objectionable crimes that have been committed upon Americans in any part of the world.

So, even though I will support a proposition that will go further than the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, this seems to me to be the very minimum this body can support if we wish to demonstrate a commitment to a cause of decency, human rights, and the cause of justice.

I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether it is not true that Ambassador Pickering indicated that the fencing of the money in last year's appropriation had a positive impact in moving the whole case of the churchwomen forward through the judicial system in El Salvador?

Mr. SPECTER. The Ambassador has not stated that directly to me, but I understand that the Ambassador has so stated.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator. I was present when the Ambassador was asked specifically about the fencing under reasonable conditions, and he indicated a positive response.

I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, I hope that the amendment in the second degree will be successful, but I just want to add my support, if it is not, for taking this action. I think that is a bare minimum we should take in regard to this very sad situation.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, it will be my intention to offer a motion to table the Specter amendment. However, it is my understanding that the Senator from Vermont may have an amendment to the Specter amendment. Is that correct?

Mr. LEAHY. The Senator is correct.

I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania has about a minute remaining, and I was going to wait until his time was used and then propose an amendment on behalf of myself and the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. DODD) to the Specter amendment.

Mr. KASTEN. So it would be an amendment in the second degree to the Specter amendment, with a 30-minute time limit, equally divided.

Mr. LEAHY. No; it is an amendment with a 2-hour time limitation.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold, the Senator from Mississippi would like to make a brief comment, and I yield such time as he may desire to the distinguished ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I shall speak briefly. I know I will not change Senator LEAHY's mind, but I would like him to listen.

Mr. President, this is an appropriations bill, and we, in effect, settled the amount that was going to be added, after considering all the facts. The committee did not take it casually. We adopted the Inouye amendment in its final form, and it is in the bill now.

Many amendments have been offered to it that are really policy amendments, with reference to the unfortunate situation that those people are in, and that we are in, to a degree.

I submit that the thing for us to do now is to move this bill along. The Inouye amendment for $61 million plus has been agreed on. I think there would be a much better chance to get this matter settled correctly and favorably as to the Senate's position in conference if we just keep that agreement as it was in the committee and let it ride on that basis.

I am in sympathy with everybody else as to the loss of life down there, and we will have to go after it in a different way, I think, rather than tying some activity on their part to an appropriations bill. That seems to me to be an awkward way. It is awkward legislation. I speak with all deference to the author of the amendment.

I hope we can keep the bill in good shape legislatively and move on with the figure everyone has agreed to, $61,750,000.

I yield the floor.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Mississippi, the distinguished ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee, and I share his views.

I think it is time to move along, and I am hopful that now we will be able to do so.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I understand that until my full time is used, an amendment in the second degree cannot be offered.

This is a good occasion to respond very briefly to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi.

This condition on an appropriation bill, I submit, is most reasonable and appropriate procedurally.

This 30-percent limitation was a part of the appropriation bill for fiscal year 1984. There is no sound distinction, as previously argued, that it is different because this is an emergency appropriation bill.

An appropriation bill is an appropriation bill is an appropriation bill, and they traditionally carry limitations.

It was by agreement with the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN), with agreement of the administration on 30 percent last year—and concurrence of the House of Representatives and the signature of the President.

I realize, realistically viewed, it is the integrity of the appropriations process which this Senator is now calling into play.

We have said there should be limitation on the money we are appropriating for El Salvador to get this egregious case tried. If we do not maintain this kind of a limitation, we make ourselves a little foolish.

Certainly there is nothing procedurally to bar this limitation, this condition coming up at this time on something this body has already done in the appropriation. The precedent is 100 percent in accordance with what this amendment does and what this Senator is pressing at this moment.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. LEAHY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the remaining time on the amendment.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to submit an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania on behalf of myself and Mr. DODD and that I be allowed a 2-hour time limitation, evenly divided, as we have on these other amendments.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, it is my understanding that the Senator from Vermont is interested in combining a number of amendments on this same subject matter. If that is correct, I am anxious to try to work with some time limits on a couple of different amentments. There is a Dodd amendment and a Kennedy amendment on the same subject.

If we are able, in the interest of time, as the Senator from Mississippi just said, at the same time to have as part of this unanimous-consent request that a number of these other amendments be withdrawn, then I would be willing to go forward with the Leahy amendment relating to expenditures of prior funds in El Salvador on a 2-hour time limit, and I would not object.

Mr. LEAHY. I say to the Senator from Wisconsin if we do it this way we will be saving ourselves at least 4 hours.

I am trying, as I told the Senator from Wisconsin the other night, to work our way out of this. I have every intention, partly because of his own cooperation, to try to cut down the time.

I am not even sure we would use the 2-hour time limitation. I assure the Senator that is the intention of those proposing this amendment, to cut out other amendments. Without Senators in the Chamber I cannot speak specifically which amendments could be disposed with. But I give the Senator my own personal assurance we are saving about 4 hours doing it this way.

Mr. KASTEN. The Senator from Vermont and I are trying to get to the same place.

Before we break in and allow an extra 2 hours on a 30-minute amendment, I think we should get the other side of the equation in order as well, so that we know which amendments we agree to take down and which will be proposed.

So I shall suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that the——

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold a moment, the unanimous-consent agreement is No. 15 which has a 4-hour limitation. That would not be brought up if we do this one. If this one goes up, it goes in place of No. 29 on the list which was a 2-hour time limitation.

What I am doing is taking 6 hours worth of amendments and asking unanimous consent to bring it in and make it a 2-hour amendment.

Mr. KASTEN. I understand what the Senator is doing, and I am working with him.

It is the Senator's intention that as part of the unanimous-consent request the amendment with the 4-hour time limit be withdrawn. And I also ask the Senator if he could speak for the Senator from Massachusetts, and I see the Senator from Massachusetts is in the Chamber. Does he also intend to bring down his amendment that is on exactly the same subject matter?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I can indicate to the floor manager that the amendment in all effect has been incorporated in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Connecticut.

So I would not call up my amendment on that particular issue. I intend to be a cosponsor on the Leahy-Dodd amendment.

Mr. KASTEN. One of our problems is that I am working with a piece of paper that does not have numbered amendments.

But I have no objection. Let me do it the other way. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. KENNEDY. Perhaps we should suggest the absence of a quorum with the time to be charged on the bill to work this out.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an amendment on behalf of myself and Mr. DODD to the amendment by Mr. SPECTER be in order; further, that we have, as before, our time limitation equally divided; further, as part of the same request, that the amendment by Mr. DODD restricting aid to El Salvador pending final disposition of the cases relating to the murder of four churchwomen, on which there was a 4-hour time limitation, be withdrawn; and further, that a Leahy-Dodd amendment prohibiting use of funds appropriated in this bill for El Salvador if previously appropriated funds for fiscal year 1984 remain unobligated or unexpended, with a 2-hour limitation, be withdrawn.

If I might, Mr. President, I put that all as part of an overall unanimous-consent request. Basically what I am doing is substituting this one amendment for all of the other amendments that we had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield back my time remaining on the Specter amendment in order to make it possible for the Senator from Vermont to offer his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Time is yielded back.

Mr. LEAHY. I put my unanimous-consent request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 2882

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), for himself and Mr. DODD proposes an amendment numbered 2882 to the Specter amendment numbered 2881.

On line 2 of the amendment proposed by Mr. SPECTER, strike out "Not more than 70 percent" and insert "None."

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, yesterday the majority of our colleagues here in the Senate voted for the whole $62 million in additional military aid for El Salvador. Now, many of my colleagues who did this, who supported the whole request, made it very clear that they were doing it only on the basis that certain conditions be attached to these funds. In that regard, I also support, to an extent, the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER).

But, with all due respect to that amendment—an amendment which is basically the one that passed last year—it did not work last year as everybody felt it should. I think that many of the Senators who voted for it last year did so with the strong and real intention that it might bring about some changes in the judicial system in El Salvador.

I might say, though, that there were some observers of the scene here in the Senate who stated at that time that all it would do would provide a shield behind which others could hide and not have to face an angry constituency asking why money was continuing to El Salvador when nothing was happening in the case involving the murdered churchwomen.

Now, if we are ever to see a trial in this case, we are going to have to keep up pressure. And if we keep up the pressure, there is no reason why there could not be a trial within the next few weeks. We have given them the evidence. We have put the case together. The people have been charged. And if pressure and motivation are there we could have a trial in a few short weeks, certainly in time to meet the military needs of El Salvador. All the government has to do, after we have appropriated these funds, is convene a trial that has been 3½ years in the making.

If we send some mixed signals, Mr. President, if we do as we did last year, we say that we are going to withhold funds until justice is done. Then all of a sudden we find ourselves in a new fiscal year, and new funds come and we say once more we are going to withhold funds until justice is done. I call this a mixed signal. And it is not going to take them very long down there to realize that: "Aha, this is what is done up in the U.S. Senate. Each year they will write out x number of millions of U.S. taxpayers' dollars for the foreign aid for El Salvador and each year they will say we will hold back a certain amount until we have a trial in the case of the churchwomen."

Now it is not going to take somebody down there very long to figure out that if you want both the money and want to avoid a trial, all you have to do is discount that 20 percent or 30 percent, take all the rest of the money, which so far has proven to be plenty of money for what they need—after all, taxpayers have supported them with close to $1 billion in the last 2 years—and not have a trial.

So they get exactly what they want—no trial, the money, and a lot of Senators can go home and say, "Well, you know, we voted to hold back money until we had a trial." Everybody ends up a winner. Everyone is a winner except, of course, the sense of justice that we espouse in this country and, of course, the four murdered churchwomen.

So let us be consistent. Let us say, "All right, you know we really meant it. Surprise, surprise, for the first time, in putting restrictions on aid to El Salvador, we meant it." And this is the way we can do it.

So if Senators have voted for the aid levels, but they do want to support the existing law and conditions, they can support our amendment. All my amendment says—it actually appeals to my frugal Vermont soul—is you do not get any more money until the money that has already been appropriated for you gets spent.

Now, I do not want to equate the power and majesty of the U.S. Senate with the Vermont State Legislature, but I think here in the U.S. Senate we could probably learn a lesson. Up there they would not start spending new money on a program until the program has spent the money it already had.

Furthermore, our amendment will strengthen the existing law, which will underscore the expressed concern of the Senate, the House, and the President. The U.S. Senate, the House of Representatives, and the President of the United States have all said we are going to withhold funds unless and until there is a trial in the case of the four murdered American churchwomen.

Great. I suspect the vast majority of the people in this country agree with that. And all we are saying to that vast majority of people in this country is, "You know, when we put that restriction on your tax dollars, we really meant it."

Now that may be the part that is going to be a surprise. That could be the real surprise in this whole debate: We have actually put a restriction on aid to El Salvador, on the use of American tax dollars in foreign aid, and meant it.

31-059 O-87-7 (Pt. 6)

No additional funds approved in this bill can be spent until all existing funds that we have already appropriated for El Salvador have been obligated and expended. Let us not dip into a new pot of money until all of the existing funds have been used up.

Congress approved, and the President accepted, the funding level for the current year at $64.8 million. These funds are available. Contrary to the impression you might get in listening to the debate, this money has not all been spent.

All I am saying is, let us let the United States comply with existing law before we dole out more foreign aid. It is not a question of whether El Salvador complies with the law, it is whether we comply with the law. The Senator from Pennsylvania had a good amendment last year. And I am saying let us all stand up and say we meant it.

This was not done as a smoke screen. I know the Senator from Pennsylvania, who has studied this, did not mean it as such. The Senator from Pennsylvania was very sincere. Those of us who voted for it were very sincere. The American people, who want these cases to come to trial, are very sincere.

Now, we must go beyond sincerity. We must actually to make it work. Thirty percent of the fiscal year 1984 military aid will be held until there is a verdict in the case of the four murdered American churchwomen.

In fact, I think back to whatever pressure had been brought forth. After all, we have had three Ambassadors in this administration—three American Ambassadors in the past 3½ years—in El Salvador. All three have said it is the position of the United States that those who are guilty should come to trial. The Vice President of the United States has gone down there, and he said it. The President of the United States says it. Now we are saying it.

In fact, I would hope that Senator SPECTER would join me in this amendment and would join me in my effort to strengthen and support his original proposal. It was a good one borne out of his own close experience with the criminal justice system in El Salvador. Both Senator SPECTER and I have served—and served for a while at the same time—as prosecutors. We know what is involved here. We also know that the nuns were killed in 1980. And we know what the evidence is. We know what the roadblocks have been. And we know of the need to apply pressure.

I believe that is why the administration accepted the original Specter amendment. We gave our full support to it. We withheld 30 percent of the military aid for the current fiscal year. But now we have reached that point. We have reached the point where we should let El Salvador know whether we were actually serious or not. This amendment tells El Salvador whether we are serious or not about the restrictions that we voted for in the Senate.

If we support this amendment, we are serious about the restriction that we voted for and that President Reagan signed into law. If we say, however, we are going to allow a loophole, and we are going to allow the money to keep on going whether the Government of El Salvador pays any attention to it or not, then we tell them we are not serious. It is really that simple. It is a black-and-white issue. If we seriously want restrictions, we will vote for my amendment. If we want to leave a loophole in there, and allow the money to go no matter what, we vote against it. You really cannot have it both ways.

So let us ask: Have we forgotten what we did just a few months ago? Have we forgotten the restrictions we put on the legislation? Are we saying that, as brutal and horrible as those cases were, we do not really care, or are we saying that the United States when it gives its foreign aid actually stands for something?

I do not expect every country that receives our foreign aid to be perfect. I do not expect every country to conform to the model of the United States just because it receives our foreign aid. That is not the way it should be. Each country is sovereign. Each country is different. But we ought to have certain basic considerations when we give American tax dollars. We look at a country that has allowed within the highest levels of its government either the committing or the condoning of murders—the most vicious, violent, and horrible murders against its own citizens—and yet we continue to send money down there. Are we not willing to say stop, enough, we are not going to accept American money going down to a government which condones the killing of its own people? Can we at least draw the line and say we are not going to send it down, if you are going to kill Americans, too? After all, Mr. President, we have given them the evidence. We have shown them who is responsible for these murders. We have not even flinched when we found some of the evidence had mysteriously disappeared, and that the evidence put in their hands suddenly dissipated.

Mr. President, let us not let the United States be played the fool in this case. Do one of two things: Either say here are American tax dollars, do whatever you want with it, no restrictions at all. We will leave it to your good graces that the killings will stop. We will leave it to your good graces that you are not going to restrain one of your highest public officials who is involved in death squad activities.

We are going to leave it to your good graces whether the deaths of the American churchwomen will be handled within your jurisdiction system; or, we are going to put restrictions on our aid.

I for one having looked at past performance and am not willing to vote American tax dollars with no strings attached for El Salvador. If we are going to vote restrictions, let us make them real.

Let us not have the United States be a paper tiger in this case. Let us not have the United States stand up and allow us to give great sounding well-meaning speeches but then have nothing result from it. Let us make sure that the restrictions are really there. There is only one way of doing it. The only way of doing it is saying that last year when we voted for the Specter amendment we were serious. It might be a heck of a break with tradition on some of these foreign aid matters. It really might shake the foundations of the Senate a wee bit. But it would be good for the soul.

Can you not imagine how good it would be for all of us to be able to go home and say to our constituents, guess what? I voted for something in the U.S. Senate and I really meant it. I meant what I did. When I told you that I really wanted restrictions on that foreign aid and your tax dollars to bring about some trials of those responsible for the murder of your fellow Americans, I really meant it. And you know, here is the proof of how I meant it.

Mr. President, most of us may find, if we spend time at home, that the American people are way ahead of us. We may find that Republicans, Democrats, conservatives, moderates, and liberals agree with us on that. Mr. President, I hope all those Senators who have voted for the Specter amendment—and I was one of them—will now vote for this amendment which says we really meant it. We were telling the truth when we voted for it.

Mr. President, I see the distinguished Senator from New Jersey on the floor. The Senator is one who has moved very strongly in caucus, in committee and on the floor of the Senate to bring about justice in the case of American churchwomen. I know no one who has had a stronger voice in this. I would like to yield to the Senator at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. KASSEBAUM). The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. I thank the Senator from Vermont.

I rise in support of the amendment proposed by the Senators from Vermont and Connecticut.

Madam President, in the case of the four American churchwomen brutally murdered by Salvadoran soldiers in December 1980, the time for words has passed.

For 3 years the Congress has pressed the President of the United States, and the military and civilian authorities in El Salvador, for progress in this case. The Congress felt so strongly about bringing the soldiers to trial, that before adjourning in 1983 we directly linked 30 percent of our military assistance to El Salvador this year—over $19 million—to a final verdict in this case. Yet, instead of a final verdict that would have released this $19 million, we have been sent a new request for military aid to El Salvador.

Madam President, many of my colleagues in the Senate have expressed their concern about the murder of the four churchwomen in El Salvador since December of 1980. Congressional efforts to see justice done were well underway when I came to the Senate over a year ago. But it was a visit with William Ford, a constituent of mine, shortly after I took office that focused my own attention on this case.

Bill Ford came to talk to me about his sister, Ita, and how she died. Ita Ford was a Maryknoll Sister. She has committed her life to serving God and alleviating the misery of others. And when she died, she was working in El Salvador.

Ita Ford did not simply die. She was brutally and intentionally murdered. Her murderers were Salvadoran soldiers. They were soldiers of the same army we have supported with our military aid.

Bill Ford in 1983 was seeking justice. He simply wanted his sister's murderers prosecuted. But the Salvadoran Government showed no enthusiasm for a trial for the five suspects from the National Guard who had been detained and charged.

Early last summer, more than half of the Senate met with the Provisional President of El Salvador, Alvaro Magana, in this very Capitol. We were told by President Magana that justice would be prompt. We were told that a trial would be announced within weeks. But weeks passed, months have passed, now it is spring and months have passed and Bill Ford is still seeking justice.

In response to suggestions from the Congress, the Reagan administration last summer appointed a special legal advisor, former Federal Judge Harold Tyler of New York. Judge Tyler was to review the evidence and circumstances surrounding the murder of the four American churchwomen and to study the Salvadoran investigation and prosecution efforts.

Judge Tyler submitted his findings and recommendations to the Department of State in December 1983. The Department has classified this report. It has not been available to the public, nor to the families of the churchwomen.

It is available to Senators. I have read it. I urge my colleagues who have not yet read it to do so. It contains revealing information about the larger political questions facing us in El Salvador and about this particular crime.

While this report remains classified, its contents have been reviewed by the press, including the New York Times. The press has reported that Judge Tyler found a Salvadoran Government coverup began within days of the crime, possibly with the acquiescence of the current Minister of Defense. The press has reported that Judge Tyler found a society floundering in violence, under the pervasive influence of the military. The press has reported that Judge Tyler's best judgment is that those five National Guardsmen charged with the murder of the churchwomen acted without specific direction from higher-ups, but with the expectation that they would never be prosecuted.

These reported findings by an independent, respected judge should give us pause as we consider the aid request now before us. Are we honestly prepared to continue our military assistance with no conditions attached? Have we become so cynical that coverups, corruption, or political murders no longer prompt our disgust, but argue, instead, for looser conditions, or no conditions at all?

This is the choice we have before us now: Will we stick by the conviction that prompted us 6 months ago to say, "This much aid and no more until we have a verdict?" Or will we say, "Despite our decision in 1983, despite not having a verdict, here is more assistance."

The administration points to positive developments in this case since we adopted our 30-percent condition last year. The case, in fact, was elevated to the trial stage in February. Our Ambassador to El Salvador, Thomas R. Pickering, has advised Senators in recent weeks that we should expect a trial in the case by late April or early May.

The administration cites the March 25 elections as another positive development. Members of Congress who returned from observing those elections have shared their observations with us. They saw people travel along dusty and dangerous roads to vote. They saw people stand in the hot sun for hours to vote. The candidate most in tune with American principles—José Napoleon Duarte—received a strong plurality of the vote. This is progress. This is important.

But, Madam President, Bill Ford and his family still await justice for their beloved Ita. They have had years of positive developments and high expectations and predictions of final action. Support for the Leahy-Dodd amendment will make it clear to the military and political leaders in El Salvador—and to President Reagan—that we want a verdict in this case, that we want to know if there was a coverup by military or civilian leaders still holding office.

Madam President, we know that there will be a run-off election for President in El Salvador in 4 or 5 weeks. Either Mr. Duarte or Roberto d'Aubuisson will become the new President of El Salvador some weeks thereafter. It is clear that Duarte and d'Aubuisson would lead El Salvador in very different directions. Duarte campaigned on a platform of national dialog, national reconciliation, an end to death squad activities, a commitment to justice. d'Aubuisson pledged to militarily eliminate his opposition. An entrenched military that traditionally has intervened whenever reform is in the wind adds to the uncertainty ahead.

This is the time to attach strong conditions to additional military aid and to register our support for political and economic reform in El Salvador.

The sponsors of this amendment support democratic governments in Central America that are friendly to the United States. But political reform, economic development, respect for basic human rights, and a functioning system of justice are vital to the achievement of this goal. Assisting a people to elect their leaders is a good step. Assisting those leaders in bringing peace and justice to their people is the next step.

My abhorrence of the death squads and the prevailing climate of violence from the right-wing in El Salvador certainly does not blind me to the dangers of the left. But we must ask, Madam President, what kind of Nation we are and what kind of regimes we are willing to support.

Will we embrace any regime just because it poses as the only alternative to communism? Will we turn our backs on Ita and Bill Ford? Or will we insist on justice? Will we insist that elections be accompanied by real and lasting social change and political progress?

I do not believe the problems in El Salvador are amenable to a military solution. There is no prospect of success or gain for the United States in continued military escalation. Indeed, after 4 years of military and economic assistance totaling $1 billion, here are the administration's own figures. There is no economic growth. There is unemployment of over 30 percent. There are three times as many guerrilla fighters. There are 40,000 civilian victims of death squads. There is virtually no system of justice. The guerrillas get half of their arms from the shipments we make to the Salvadoran Army, either through corruption or incompetence. And we have been training officers and men for the Salvadoran Army since 1948, over 35 years.

Emphasis on a military solution works against our interest in building democracy and promoting economic development. We find ourselves allied to military forces that are both repressive and corrupt. We can hardly influence, much less control them. Our military commitment has become so sweeping, so unconditional that we find it almost impossible to pull back, even when every other interest in economic development and human rights is trampled.

Emphasis on a military response also prevents us from joining hands with moderates in the region. It polarizes people into extreme positions. It removes incentives to resolve conflicts at the negotiating table or in the political arena. It weakens the hands of moderates and centrists.

Heavy reliance on a military strategy in Central and South America also forfeits the support of other countries in the region interested in furthering mediation and negotiation. It prevents us from taking advantage of an effort like that put forward by Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and Panama—the Contadora Group—to seek regional negotiations to end the fighting; to end foreign military shipments and advisors; to cooperate on economic and democratic political development.

It prevents us from trying to unite the Americas against Soviet encroachment and Cuban adventurism through the Organization of American States or other forums, despite the natural predisposition in this direction of almost every country to the south of us.

Madam President, our hemispheric leadership is at stake.

Every American, Democrat, Republican, Independent, wants to see democracy take hold in Central America. And every American wants our basic political values firmly established in the hearts and minds of the people of Latin America,

The question before us remains how best to achieve these goals. By militarizing Honduras? By emphasizing military aid at the expense of human rights? By ignoring land reform, judicial reform, and economic justice?

No.

We will never achieve our goals if we tolerate, much less support oppression, murder, or injustice. But if we set clear priorities—if we stay true to our own revolution and traditions—I am confident that the hope for justice, peace, opportunity, and democratic government we all share here—can triumph there, in Central America.

We can start by approving this amendment.

I urge my colleagues to join in this search for justice and human rights reform in El Salvador.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I yield myself such time as I may need on the Leahy amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, since October 1979, the military and national security forces of El Salvador—at times conspiring with the death squads—have killed more than 38,000 civilian noncombatants and caused the disappearance of 2,600 more persons. These statistics were compiled by the Human Rights Monitoring Office of the Roman Catholic Diocese in San Salvador.

Who are these victims? Have the perpetrators been punished?

The American people and the U.S. Congress know well the names of at least 10 of those victims, for they were our fellow citizens—Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman, whom we have just discussed, Maura Clarke, Ita Ford, Dorothy Kazel, Jean Donovan, whom I wish to discuss now, John Sullivan, Michael Kline, Patricia Cuellar and Lt. Comdr. Alfred Schaufelberger.

It was December 2, 1980, when Maura Clarke, Ita Ford, Dorothy Kazel, and Jean Donovan left San Salvador's international airport in a white van. That was the last day they were seen alive. Two days later, their bodies were discovered in an unmarked grave southeast of the airport.

The four American churchwomen had been brutally raped and murdered. What was their offense? They were caring for the poor, feeding the hungry, and treating the ill. For expressing compassion for their fellow human beings, someone considered them a threat. So they were killed.

That was over 3 years ago. Since that crime in 1980, there have been no trials, there have been no verdicts, there have been no sentences.

A short time after this murder, U.S. officials cited circumstantial evidence of possible security force involvement. The FBI was sent to assist. Sixteen sets of fingerprints were lifted from the burnedout van. Ballistic tests revealed that the women were killed by bullets from the type of high-powered rifle regularly used by the security forces. Within several months, the FBI was reported to have developed conclusive evidence that six national guardsmen were involved in the slayings.

Salvadoran authorities, however, initially stonewalled and refused to press the investigation. A high-level commission was belatedly named to investigate the murder. That commission included two close friends of then-Defense Minister Garcia and a first cousin of the head of the Salvadoran Police Forces.

On May 7, 1981, the former U.S. Ambassador to El Salvador stated, "All this talk of an investigation is nothing but a big charade. * * * They knew within 3 days who was responsible."

Finally, on May 9, a full 6 months after the murders, Defense Minister Garcia confirmed to the press that six members of the armed forces had been arrested provisionally, and had been under detention since the end of April.

Six more months passed. The prosecution was stalled. In December, a new investigation was initiated, two of the original suspects were released and two new suspects were taken into custody.

In January 1982, one of the newly arrested national guardsmen confessed his own direct participation in the killings and implicated four other national guardsmen. A court then determined the suspects should be detained for future indictment. And, finally, in November 1982—almost 2 years after the crime—the case was ordered to go to trial.

What will happen next—and when?

On January 26, 1982, Defense Minister Garcia told us that the detained guardsmen would go to trial "within a very few days." That was over 2 years ago. In its July 1982 certification report, the State Department predicted: "We expect the date of the trial to be set this fall." In December 1982, the U.S. Embassy in El Salvador reported: "Salvadoran legal experts believe the case will go before a jury in late January or early February 1983," and in mid-June 1983, President Magana of El Salvador assured President Reagan and Members of Congress that a trial would begin "within 6 weeks." That was 10 months ago. Then, in July of 1983, in its fourth certification report, the State Department reported to Congress: "We are hopeful that the case will go to trial within the next few weeks." That was 9 months ago. In its January 1984 report to Congress on El Salvador, the State Department stated: "The case now seems likely to reach completion by mid-1984," and just last week, U.S. Ambassador Pickering noted that in February 1984, the case had once again been elevated to the trial stage. He assured Members of the Senate that the case would surely go to the jury soon, perhaps in May.

"Soon" is what we have been told—time in and time out—for the past 3 years—3 long years for the families of those murdered women, 3 long years for the American people.

During those years, we have learned several things. We have learned that there is not a single case in which a member of the Salvadoran Armed Forces has been tried and convicted for a politically motivated killing of a civilian noncombatant. No one disputes this fact.

We have learned more. We have learned what happened after those brutal murders took place. A distinguished American judge from New York, a former official of our Department of Justice, the Honorable Judge Harold Tyler, traveled to El Salvador last year to conduct an inquiry. One of the conclusions he came back with was that there had been a coverup, that officials within the Salvadoran Government had attempted to conceal the identities of those individuals who actually gave the order for the murders.

And we have learned even more. We now have some evidence which explains why the real parties ordering those killings and those responsible for the coverup are still at liberty.

A high-ranking Salvadoran military officer in a position to know has accused Salvadoran Defense Minister Vides Casanova of organizing the coverup. Why? Because it was his nephew, Col. Oscar Edgar Casanova, who gave the order to kill. Both of the Casanova's hold high offices in the Government and military of El Salvador.

Congress has struggled long and hard with this case. A year ago, we approved an additional certification requirement as a condition for the continued provision of military aid to El Salvador. We required the President to certify that the Government of El Salvador "has made good faith efforts both to investigate the murders of the seven U.S. citizens in El Salvador in December 1980 and January 1981 and to bring to justice all those responsible for those murders."

President Reagan pocket-vetoed this resolution extending that certification. We know why this law was not extended. As the Lawyers Committee for International Human Rights stated, "if the certification requirement where still law, the administration could not in "good faith" find compliance with the law in any of the cases" involving American citizens.

And last fall, frustrated by the lack of progress, Congress specified that 30 percent of funds appropriated for military assistance to the Government of El Salvador could not be used until there was a verdict in the trial of those charged with the murder of the American churchwomen.

There has been no verdict, and the administration was prevented from using 30 percent of the money we appropriated for El Salvador last year.

As if nothing happened between the time we passed Senator SPECTER'S amendment and the President signed it into law, the administration has now come back to us and is asking for more money. It is as if the Specter amendment—and the President's own signature signing that amendment into law—did not exist. It is as if the administration had forgotten about the murder of the four American churchwomen. It is as if we should suppress our outrage over the coverup, the stonewalling, the obstruction of justice in this case.

How much longer must we wait for justice?

How much longer must we wait for the Government of El Salvador to investigate the coverup?

Last year, we told the administration and we told the Salvadoran Government that we would wait no longer, that justice was required before we would appropriate any more military assistance. Let us repeat that message. Let us stand with the families of the murdered churchwomen. Let us insist that justice be done, and that it be done today.

When we took that stand last year, the authorities in El Salvador took note. The trial was elevated to the plenary stage in February 1984.

Today we must repeat this message. The Leahy-Dodd amendment would withhold additional military assistance until the conditions set forth in the Specter amendment, signed last year by the President, are met. I fully support this amendment and urge my colleagues to adopt it. If the administration is correct, if the trial does occur in early May, this amendment will delay delivery of additional funds to El Salvador by only several weeks at most.

Madam President, let us remind the administration that the Specter amendment still lives, and must be abided by. But most of all, let us send a clear and unequivocal message to those in El Salvador who have hampered prosecution of this case: Justice must be done.

Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, with the time to be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PELL. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. Madam President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. PELL. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that my name be added as a cosponsor of the Leahy-Dodd amendment, which is under consideration at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. Madam President, in my mind, this is an excellent amendment, and it is a reflection of the strong sense of frustration, exasperation, and concern that the American people and many of us in Congress are experiencing over the case of the churchwomen murdered in El Salvador.

This amendment is of particular interest and particular concern to my State, where there have been intense interest, sorrow, grief, and anguish over the murder of these churchwomen.

There is a group of people who come and tell us of their concerns as they demonstrate and pray every Friday. They receive a warm welcome as they do so in my office. All told, they have done their best to raise the level of interest and sensitivity to these brutal murders. I congratulate these people on the work they have done in this regard.

We should remember that those dedicated and devoted women were brutally murdered in December 1980, and today, 3½ years later, there is still no sign of a trial. It is true that the Salvadoran legal system is practically nonexistant but there has been an enormous amount of foot-dragging on the part of the Salvadoran authorities.

I believe that this amendment, which states that no funds are to be provided for military assistance under this supplemental appropriation unless those guardsmen charged with these deaths are brought to trial, with a verdict rendered, would send the appropriate message. It says that the American people are finally serving notice on the Salvadoran Government, which has had enough time to bring those guilty of these murders to trial.

If the military assistance is desired as much as we are led to believe, then the Government must finally bring the case to trial and render a verdict.

I do not think there has been a crime of such hideous proportions as this for a long time. These women were raped and murdered for no cause whatsoever. Apparently, two of them had been followed by the local security authorities as they went to get the other two at the airport. The security officers, or the men who were shadowing them, asked their superior officers what they should do, and apparently they were told to murder them. I do not know if they were told to rape them or not. Then they proceeded to rape and murder these dedicated women. It is a true crime. I do not like to use the word "avenge"; but until those who perpetrated it are brought to justice, there cannot be normal relations between the Government of El Salvador and the Government of the United States.

Certainly, from the viewpoint of the people in the United States, this crime is one that really makes them cringe. I may not be reflecting the wishes of this body as I have watched the votes in the last few days, during which the Senator from Massachusetts has received only 25 or so votes on each of these issues; but I would wager that in the country as a whole, the sympathy and support for this kind of amendment is greater.

I hope the administration will bear with us and permit some strong action to bring the Salvadoran Government to heel. The fact that there are fewer killings today or this week or this month than there were 2 years ago may be correct. But we should also remember that just a few less is not enough. We still have a government of a nation where more political murders are taking place than in any other nation I can think of at this time on this Earth.

Mr. DODD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Madam President, I yield the Senator from Connecticut whatever time he desires.

Mr. DODD. Madam President, first, I commend our colleague from Rhode Island for his comments. Over the past 2 or 3 years, he has been extremely outspoken on this issue. He has consistently reminded not only the Foreign Relations Committee but this body as well of the seriousness of this issue, not as it is in one particular case but what it reflects as the overall lack of concern that would appear on the the part of those in positions of authority in the Government of El Salvador for the indiscriminate loss of human life in that country.

Madam President, it was on an evening more than 3 years ago that Ita Ford, Maura Clarke, Dorothy Kazel, and Jean Donovan left El Salvador's Cuscatlan International Airport and were forced to detour into a hell we can only imagine, a hell they would not survive. The following morning, the van of these four women was found burned, its license plates removed, on a road near the airport. One day later, in shallow, makeshift graves nearly 20 miles away, their bodies were discovered. Mutilated, savagely assaulted, they were executed gangland style, each with a bullet through the head.

What crime did these four women commit to warrant such a brutal sentence? These were churchwomen. Ita Ford and Maura Clarke were of the Maryknoll order. Dorothy Kazel was an Ursuline nun. Jean Donovan was a Roman Catholic lay missionary. They were in El Salvador not for selfish reasons or personal gain but rather for the most selfless work any individual can choose. Thousands of miles from home, from family and friends, they traveled to El Salvador to help the many in that country who desperately needed their help.

That was their crime. They are El Salvador's subversives, we are told. Subversive for helping the have-nots, the downtrodden, the politically forgotten people of El Salvador. Subversive for helping to educate the illiterate, to feed the malnourished, to cure the sick. Subversive for helping to clothe the ragged, to house the homeless, to sustain the destitute.

In El Salvador, subversion is a capital crime punishable by death, by violent death. It is a crime for which tens of thousands have paid with their lives. Nearly 40,000 Salvadorans, civilians, have been tried and found guilty by this obscene system. Nearly 40,000 have perished, 40,000 in a country of 5 million people.

The numbers, it would appear, are antiseptic. They do not portray either the horrific nature of these crimes or the staggering human tragedy. But try, Madam President, if you will, to imagine if a million and a half Americans were savagely murdered in 3 years, and proportionately that is what the number would be in this country, in my home State, Connecticut, it would mean nearly half the population, and imagine the outrage if no one was ever convicted for any of these deaths.

Madam President, there has not been one single conviction in El Salvador, none for the murders of nearly 40,000 civilians in that country. Think of that. Not one single conviction in 4 years—40,000 human beings have died, brutally mutilated, limbs dismembered from their bodies, their thumbs wired behind their backs, shot within inches of their heads. And not one single conviction in 4 years. None for the murders of the two American labor advisers, and obviously none for the murders of the four churchwomen. Over 40,000 fellow human beings in a nation for which we have provided $1,200,000,000 in the last 4 years.

Were these crimes committed by such experts no law enforcement officer could find the culprits? Were the facts so hazy no judge could pass sentence? Hardly. In the churchwomen's case, we—and the Salvadorans—could identify the murderers merely hours after the crime was discovered.

The history in this case is nearly as tragic and horrifying as the case itself. Though the murderers were known only hours after they reportedly celebrated their night's work at an airport bar, it would be nearly 5 months before they were arrested and, then, they were arrested only provisionally.

Ten months later, in February 1982, a court announcement said one of the five suspected former national guardsmen had confessed clearly, fully, and spontaneously to the crime. No matter. Another 9 months would pass before a Salvadoran judge would order them to stand trial. At the time, the judge's secretary was quoted as saying the trial would not have been ordered "unless (the judge) had enough to hang" the accused.

That was in November 1982, almost 2 years after the violent murders were committed. In March 1983, the headlines told only of further trial delays.

In December 1983, 3 years after the murders, a former U.S. Federal judge and Deputy Attorney General issued his report on the case—a report which has been classified by the State Department. The published accounts of that report tell us only the sad but obvious truth: There was a coverup by the Salvadoran authorities that began within days of the killings.

Madam President, in April 1981, when I wrote the certification bill attaching conditions to U.S. military aid to El Salvador, I included a onetime certification with regard to the investigation and prosecution of those responsible for the churchwomen's murders. I did not expect to be back on the Senate floor in July 1982 arguing again for such a certification. Nor did I anticipate that in writing the 1984 foreign aid bill such a certification would still be needed. And, I certainly did not expect to be standing before you today arguing once again for legislation to insure that our actions and our rhetoric are inseparable.

The amendment, Madam President, that I am offering, along with my colleague from Vermont, represents, I would argue, no drastic policy change, no dramatic revision of existing law. In fact, it is only consistent with existing policy, with existing law. It simply applies the policy we adopted with the continuing resolution concerning military aid to El Salvador to this additional military aid request now before us.

On three separate occasions in the House of Representatives and in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on two separate occasions on the Senate floor, this has been a policy strongly endorsed and supported.

Congress clearly stated that policy as late as last year. Thirty percent of the $65 million in aid El Salvador would receive in military assistance in fiscal year 1984 would be contingent on the resolution of the churchwomen's case. Yet this case has not been resolved and for that very compelling reason, El Salvador has not received approximately $20 million in military assistance.

The amendment now before the Senate is equally clear. Before we provide El Salvador with another penny in military aid, that $20 million must be spent, the churchwomen's case must be resolved, and we must not back away from our own commitments. That is what this amendment says.

Yet today we would be doing just that if this amendment is not adopted. Today we would ignore even our own advice. We would forget what only months ago we urged others to remember. We would shift gears. We would dramatically change course. We would abandon our own judgments and more than double the amount of military aid we have provided in El Salvador already. And in so doing, we would be abandoning the values and traditions through which our country and our people have found strength, the same values and traditions which led Ita Ford, Maura Clarke, Dorothy Kazel, and Jean Donovan to El Salvador in the first place.

The choice before us is not a difficult one, nor should it be. We can face the violent reality that is El Salvador. We can live up to our own values and traditions. Or, we can put on President Reagan's rose-colored glasses. We can speak strongly and loudly about democracy and justice and then wink slyly at the Salvadoran death squads.

Many words have been written and published about the murder of the four American churchwomen. Among them are two passages I would like to include in the RECORD today. That they are still applicable more than 3 years after the churchwomen were killed, and more than 1 year after they were written, speaks loudly in support of the pending amendment.

I quote these two passages: "More than American moralism is at stake," the November 18, 1982, New York Times editorial read:

> In a bitter civil war many crimes will go unpunished. But when a government proves incapable of curbing the worst excesses of its own forces it converts its own population to the guerrilla cause. For El Salvador's sake, no less than ours, progress on human rights is a valid touchstone for aid.

In the nuns' case, a March 18, 1983, editorial, the Washington Post read:

> The issue is not merely that the nuns' case embarrasses the administration. It cheapens the United States, the whole nation, to be a party to this farce any longer.

We can be a party to this farce. We can send another $62 million in military aid and ignore our own laws, abandon our stated principles, or, we can demand that this $62 million arrive in El Salvador as the law we wrote unequivocally states it should: After the resolution of the brutal murders of four American churchwomen.

Death is a way of life in El Salvador and it will remain so until fundamental economic, social, and political changes are made. Our aid and our assistance must be dedicated to those changes. That dedication, that commitment, can be no less than the dedication and commitment made by those struck down by El Salvador's brutal assassins.

The task before us is to do all we can to insure that they—Salvadoran, American, Dutch, or Mexican—did not die in vain. That is the message contained in this amendment. That is the only message we can send to the Salvadoran Government and to the world if our policy is to be consistent and grounded on our own democratic traditions and values.

Madam President, I yield the floor.

Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. DODD. To be equally divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KASTEN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Time runs equally against both sides.

Mr. KASTEN. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, the time to be equally divided between each side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KASTEN. Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania to speak in opposition to the amendent.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. KASTEN).

Madam President, it is the underlying amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania which calls for the withholding of 30 percent of the $61 million until there is a verdict in the case involving the four American churchwomen, and it is an amendment in the second degree which seeks to cut off all the funds until there is a verdict in the case involving the four American churchwomen. I am opposed to cutting off all the funds because I believe that that would subject the situation in El Salvador to greater peril and a cutoff of all the funds is not necessary in order to keep the pressure on the El Salvadoran Government to try the case involving the four American churchwomen.

It is my sense that there has been a case made by the administration for emergency aid. That case has been expressed cogently by a number of the Senators who have spoken on this subject. I think that the analysis of the distinguished Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE) speaks eloquently to that point, and part of the aid that he referred to was the medical aid.

I think it is unwise to tie the hands of the administration totally in limiting any funds from going to El Salvador until the case of the four American churchwomen have been tried. But that is more of a cutoff than is necessary, in my judgment, to put the requisite pressure on the El Salvadoran judicial system to try the cases involving the four American churchwomen. Also, as a matter of practicality, it is more likely that Senators who vote on these measures would be inclined to vote for a 30-percent cutoff than for a 100-percent cutoff.

There is a procedural issue which we are dealing with at the moment as to a separation of the votes on what may be anticipated to be a motion to table the amendment by Senator LEAHY and Senator DODD, contrasted with the underlying amendment which has been offered by this Senator. But I did want to offer that distinction between these two positions.

I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for yielding the time to me. I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

Mr. KASTEN. Madam President, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Madam President, the Senator from Pennsylvania has worked diligently on the issue of judicial reform in El Salvador. He has been a tremendous asset in the Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, and I am most grateful to the Senator for all of his assistance and for taking the lead on this issue.

Frankly, it is because of Senator SPECTER's hard work that the Appropriations Committee on the regular bill accepted a similar amendment offered by the Senator, which was signed into law last November.

Madam President, the case is now in the plenario stage, the final stage of judicial proceedings in El Salvador. As my colleagues are aware, the judicial system in El Salvador is very different from ours, in that once the case reaches this stage all testimony and evidence has been presented to the judge. At this stage there will be no new evidence, no new testimony. All that is left is the presentation of defense briefs, the setting of a date certain for the trial, indexing of the evidence by the judge, and finally empaneling the jury.

Madam President, I honestly believe that Salvadoran officials have taken notice of the will of Congress on this matter. There is no one here who can condone the delay in this trial. I do believe that the Senator's language last year has had a positive effect on this case.

I believe that this is not the right time for a further amendment. The Salvadoran officials working on this case are doing their best to wind through the judicial system there, and that we will soon see results.

I feel the same about this amendment as a number of the other conditionality amendments. The time for us to work with these various conditions is on the authorization bill and/or on the regular appropriation bill.

At this time, I believe that all of these set-aside amendments or withholding amendments are simply delays and/or cuts. I am hopeful that this amendment will be defeated.

But at this time I want to thank, congratulate, and say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I think he has been very instrumental in working toward needed reforms, not only in the judicial area, but in a number of other areas in El Salvador. I look forward to continuing to work with him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized.

Mr. INOUYE. Madam President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time will that be?

Mr. INOUYE. My time, Madam President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the understanding of the Chair that the time is under the control of the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. INOUYE. Madam President, I yield back the balance of the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. KASTEN. Madam President, the Senator's time has been yielded back in behalf of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DODD. If the Senator will yield, I understand the time has expired.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Senator.

I yield back the balance of our time. I move to table the Specter amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

All time having been yielded back, the question is now on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) is necessarily absent.

I also announce that the Senator from Vermont (Mr. STAFFORD) is absent on official business.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Illinois (Mr. DIXON), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HART), and the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK) and the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DECONCINI) are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRASSLEY). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber wishing to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 54, nays 39, as follows:

NOT VOTING—7

Baker	Dixon	Tsongas

So the motion to lay on the table amendment No. 2881 was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield to me for the purpose only of my propounding a question to the assistant Republican leader with respect to the program for the rest of the day?

Mr. KENNEDY. Fine.

Mr. BYRD. I ask that question.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have conferred with the manager of the bill. It is my understanding that we have this Kennedy amendment before us now. There is a time agreement on that of an hour. We do not anticipate that full hour to be used.

Following that, it is my understanding, is an amendment of the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN). Is that correct?

Mr. KASTEN. If the Senator will yield, there is an amendment that we have tentatively pending following the Kennedy amendment. It may or may not require a rollcall. It is not clear at this point.

Following that, we are in the process of going back through the list with the minority side to determine which amendments have in the process of the day been combined with other amendments. Right now it looks as if we will have one and possibly two or three more rollcalls and that we would be working until 8 or 8:30 p.m. On the other hand, we will know more precisely within about 20 minutes because we will then have our list and it will be one that we can look toward in terms of one or two things we might want to finish tonight, plus what we might want to schedule for the morning.

Mr. STEVENS. I might say to my good friend that it has been a request transmitted to us that there is a desire for an executive session of the Senate on the Nicaragua amendments. That would not occur tonight, I do not believe. It would have to be tomorrow. The majority leader has been delayed, but he will be here yet this evening, I am informed.

It would be my understanding from what the Senator from Wisconsin has said that the next vote will take place sometime around 7 o'clock. Following that, there will be some negotiation over the schedule and over the amendment of the Senator from New York. We anticipate at least one more rollcall vote after that. We are negotiating with the Senator from Massachusetts on another amendment he has that affects the Intelligence Committee which I have discussed with the Senator from Arizona. It is possible we would only have one rollcall vote beyond this one, if that amendment can be worked out. Otherwise, that would call for a vote, as I understand it from the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BYRD. Does the assistant majority leader indicate on the basis of what the manager of the measure has said that the Senate will be in no later than 8 or 8:30? Is that a fair estimate?

Mr. STEVENS. We have been asked by the managers of the bill to stay in session as long as necessary to try to get through the El Salvador portion of the Central America question tonight. I think, from what I hear, it is possible to do that, being here no later than 9 or 9:30. It looks like we might get it done by as early as 8:30 I would say to my friend.

Will my friend yield, since Senator KENNEDY has yielded to him, to take up this one sensitive problem concerning a message from the House?

Mr. BYRD. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield for that purpose?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would be delighted to yield.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Massachusetts and the distinguished Democratic leader.

EXTENSION OF THE DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 1852.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That the House disagree to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1852) entitled "An Act to extend the expiration date of the Defense Production Act of 1950," and ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. ST GERMAIN, Mr. MINISH, Mr. LAFALCE, Mr. LUNDINE, Ms. OAKAR, Mr. VENTO, Mr. WYLIE, Mr. BETHUNE, and Mr. SHUMWAY be managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and agree to the conference requested by the House and that the Chair be authorized to appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. GARN, Mr. TRIBLE, and Mr. PROXMIRE conferees on the part of the Senate.

URGENT SUPPLEMENTAL FOR FISCAL YEAR 1984 PUBLIC LAW 480 PROGRAM

The Senate continued with the consideration of the joint resolution.

AMENDMENT NO. 2839

(Purpose: To Condition the Provision of Military Assistance to El Salvador on the Initiation of Unconditional Negotiations)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send to the desk my Amendment No. 2839 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) proposes an amendment numbered 2839.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in H.J. Res. 492, insert the following: "No additional funds shall be available under this or any other legislation for military assistance to the Government of El Salvador unless the President certifies to Congress by June 30, 1984, that the Salvadoran Government has agreed to participate in unconditional negotiations with all major parties to the conflict in El Salvador which are willing to participate unconditionally in such a negotiation process, and that upon the beginning of such negotiations, the Government of El Salvador agrees to attend and to negotiate in good faith: Provided, however, That this provision shall not take effect unless the opposition forces represented by the FDR/FMLN have agreed by such date to participate in such negotiations and to attend and negotiate in good faith.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. KASTEN. Parliamentary inquiry. What is the time limit on this amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One hour equally divided.

Mr. KASTEN. And the amendment is the original amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct; it is the original amendment.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, this amendment offers the U.S. Senate and the people of this country an alternative to the Reagan administration's present and past policy of unending military escalation in El Salvador.

It seeks to etch into law the requirement that a firm, honest effort be made to negotiate an end to the fighting in El Salvador.

From several days, we have been debating how much and under what conditions military aid should continue to be provided to the Government of El Salvador.

However, the fundamental issue that I am urging my colleagues to face is that the policy of military escalation has not worked over the past 3 years and it will not work in the future.

All of us share the same goals. We all want an end to the killing. We all want an end to the suffering. We all want to see political democracy, economic justice, and social development in El Salvador.

But there is a reluctance on the part of many of my colleagues to recognize that the present policy is not leading in the direction of those goals.

Whatever one might say, whatever one might wish, the present policy has produced more deaths in the conflict and more killings by the death squads. The Salvadoran economy is being destroyed. The people are suffering. And there is no one—not in Washington or in El Salvador—who believes that the recent elections will resolve the conflict.

One has to remember why there is conflict to begin with in El Salvador. There is conflict because for decades repression and fraudulent elections served to maintain 75 percent of the people of El Salvador in poverty and to deny all but the elite any real chance to participate in the political process.

In El Salvador, as Pete Vaky, former Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs has written recently, there is "a long, bitter history of injustice, poverty, brutality, and repression."

The opposition in El Salvador formed—both the guerrillas and the political groups linked to them, the FDR/FMLN—because of that history.

Our present policy does not recognize that history. It is based on a view that a military solution to the conflict will provide the basis for progress and prosperity.

After 3 years, that hope is no longer based on reality. The guerrillas control more land than they did 3 years ago. They are more numerous than they were 3 years ago. They are even more a part of the Salvadoran present and future than they were 3 years ago.

The administration policy appears to be based solely on a conviction that rising levels of arms will lead to the victory of the government's armed forces over the guerrillas.

No independent observer believes that to be a likely outcome unless there is a full U.S. military intervention with all of its disastrous consequences.

Without that eventuality, the most likely outcome is a military victory by the guerrillas at some point in the future as the armed forces of the government collapse under their own combined political divisions and declining morale.

The amendment I offer today presents an alternative to those outcomes.

It calls for mutual negotiations by the government and the opposition as the only fruitful avenue for an end to the current violence.

It would condition the provision of military aid on the certification by the President that the Government of El Salvador has agreed to participate in unconditional negotiations with all parties to the conflict. That affirmation must come before June 30. The government must also affirm that it will attend such negotiations and will negotiate in good faith.

The same requirement is placed on the FDR/FMLN. If they do not restate their willingness to participate in such unconditional negotiations and to attend and negotiate in good faith, the prohibition on military aid to the government will not take effect.

Congress has indicated its desire for such negotiations in the past. But the administration and the Government of El Salvador have not abided by that action.

As early as the 1981 Foreign Aid Authorization Act, the Congress requested in its certification requirement that the Government of El Salvador "begin discussions with all major political factions."

In addition, in May 1983, the House Foreign Affairs Committee by a vote of 36 to 1 attached language requiring The Salvadoran Government to enter into a dialog, in good faith and without preconditions with its opponents within 90 days of enactment. Again, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in May 1983 similarly urged the U.S. to use its good offices to encourage an unconditional dialog among all parties.

In June 1983, the House Foreign Affairs Committee approved legislation requiring that the Government of El Salvador engage in an unconditional dialog with the insurgents.

But what has been the response of the Government of El Salvador?

The New York Times reported on June 19, 1983, as follows:

> The provisional President of El Salvador said today that he would not comply with U.S. congressional stipulations that his government begin unconditional discussions with insurgents. He said in an interview, "we are not going to satisfy that condition!"

In his inaugural speech to the constituent assembly, President Magana stated, "we have nothing to avenge, nothing to repress, and nothing to negotiate".

We also have seen that the present government in El Salvador, as well as Roberto D'Aubuisson, as well as the armed forces, reject the idea of negotiations with the opposition. The armed forces has identified virtually the entire leadership of the opposition as traitors. The President has stated:

> When the left suggests San Salvador as a meeting place (for negotiations), the problem is that they are committing crimes against the country. If they come here, I would have to order them arrested.

There have been two meetings of the opposition with representatives of the Government's Peace Commission. Those meetings ended with the Government's representatives conditioning their participation from the outset and presenting only the single demand that the opposition turn in their weapons and with no further guarantees participate in the elections which were being held under the rules set up by the Government.

Every effort by Contadora to generate unconditional negotiations between the parties to the conflict has been opposed by the Government and by the Reagan administration.

The FDR/FMLN have for some time asserted their willingness to participate in unconditional negotiations.

Most recently, on January 31, 1984, they issued a statement accepting the process of unconditional negotiations under international auspices.

The call for negotiations to end the conflict has come from Contadora countries. It has come from Pope John II. It has come from the Salvadoran Bishops Conference.

Silence or rejection has been the response of the Government of El Salvador and the Reagan administration. This administration, despite its naming Ambassador Stone and now Ambassador Schlaudeman, continues to oppose unconditional negotiations to end the conflict. Their only response has been to condemn allowing the opposition to shoot their way into power. They forget that the armed forces shot and killed opposition leaders so often that it produced the present conflict.

Unconditional negotiations have no preordained outcome. How that process will yield a context and environment that can permit full participation by all parties in a democratic process including open and fair elections is not yet known.

But unconditional negotiations is the only avenue that can bring us to that outcome.

Finally, I would call the attention of my colleagues to the statement last month by President de la Madrid of Mexico and urge them to consider it carefully. President de la Madrid stated:

> What is needed in El Salvador is an internal process of negotiations among all major groups to end the violence and allow the establishment of a stable government that will guarantee peace, liberty and personal protection for Salvadorans.

President de la Madrid went on to analyze U.S. foreign policy. He said:

> I see U.S. policy caught between two different schools of thought. One recommends military intervention to avoid security problems that, as this sector of public opinion believes, Central American represents for the United States. The other is convinced negotiations can bring peace, democracy and economic and social development to the region. I, as President of Mexico and as an individual, believe that negotiations offer the only viable, lasting and fundamental solution. I am convinced that those of us who think this way, both in Mexico and in the United States, will prevail.

I believe that we should heed those words of the President of Mexico and recognize, as he has, that the only avenue offering any hope of resolving this conflict is the course of unconditional negotiations.

I strongly suggest to my colleagues that they consider carefully the options before us. Without negotiations, there is only additional war and additional suffering.

I strongly urge my colleagues to adopt this amendment which would condition further military aid beyond the date of June 30 on the pursuit of unconditional negotiations to end the conflict.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the amendment the Senator from Massachusetts is now offering would essentially require the democratically elected Government of El Salvador to choose between this vitally needed military assistance and its own sovereign authority. Three days after an overwhelmingly successful election, the United States, which has pressed hard for elections as an element of the democratization of that country, would be telling the people who streamed to the polls last Sunday, "never mind what they did; you must now negotiate unconditionally with those who have been trying to shoot their way into the Government."

Mr. President, the guerrillas in El Salvador have rejected elections—this is perhaps understandable because of their lack of popular support. They insist on sidestepping elections, and instead they seek to gain power through the muzzles of their guns. Mr. President, it ought not to be difficult for us to make a choice on this matter. I, for one, am willing to cast my vote with those thousands of Salvadorans who went to the polls last Sunday.

Mr. President, I do not have any more requirements for time. Is the Senator from Massachusetts prepared to yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, unless others want to speak to this issue, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts having yielded back his time, I yield back the remainder of my time.

I move to table the Kennedy amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to table the amendment. On this question, the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

So the motion to table Mr. KENNEDY's amendment (No. 2839) was agreed to.

Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), I understand, has an amendment. The Senator from Massachusetts also has an amendment.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 2836

(Purpose: To provide for a Senate and House investigation of death squads in El Salvador)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I have two amendments which I talked to the manager of the bill about. I believe that the form of them can be accepted. That would at least conclude the amendments on conditionality that I had intended to offer to this bill regarding El Salvador.

I would be glad to move expeditiously to amendment No. 2836, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

At the appropriate place add the following:

"The Senate and House Select Committees on Intelligence, in coordination with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee——"

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

"and the House Foreign Affairs Committee, shall conduct a full investigation of death squads in El Salvador and shall report to the Senate and the House of Representatives by May 31, 1984, on the extent of death squad activity, responsibility for organizing, directing and carrying out death squad killings, and progress in prosecuting those responsible for such killings."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, there has been a great deal written about death squad activities. The record will show that there have fluctuations in death squad activities over the period of recent years. But there have been a number of individual church leaders, student leaders, and political leaders who were targeted and assassinated. There has not been a single arrest and prosecution of the perpetrators.

Recently, we read in the press that the Central Intelligence Agency financed or underwrote, either directly of indirectly, individuals involved in death squad activities. I am referring to the allegation that Mr. Caranza, head of the Treasury Police, received CIA payments and was involved in death squad activities. It is my hope that we could have an examination of this issue by a committee of the U.S. Senate that has access to information regarding intelligence activities. I hope we can put to rest the issue as to whether the CIA is involved in any way, directly or indirectly, in supporting individuals who are involved in any way, directly or indirectly, in death squad activities; or, whether any funds from the Central Intelligence Agency, or any agency of the Government, is in any way being used in this particular endeavor. We also want to know, to the extent possible, what the intelligence agencies can tell us, and what the intelligence committees can tell us, about the nature of the death squad activities. That kind of examination could help us in the Congress to be more effective in eliminating their activities in El Salvador.

That is really the point that I am driving at, Mr. President, with this amendment.

I see the chairman of the Intelligence Committee on the floor, and the ranking minority member. I shall be glad to see if we can arrive at some kind of an accommodation. But I do believe that there is a very deep concern among the American people about whether the CIA is in any way involved with individuals who are associated with death squads.

It is for that reason that I have proposed the amendment. I welcome whatever comment the Senator from Arizona or the Senator from New York could make on this issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is recognized.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, as chairman of the subcommittee of the committee—and we have discussed this with the Senator from New York—we would be glad to hold such series of hearings. I had hoped that we could cover everything the Senator wants in one hearing. I think the Senator said by May 30.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I said the 31st of May, but I am glad to adjust that. I would be glad to alter or change that particular date, if it is the desire of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will keep that date flexible, we will have no problem. But we do have Easter and Memorial Day coming.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, could we make it by the 4th of July recess?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, there would be no problem with that.

I am glad that you have addressed the issue. In the case of El Salvador, there are many sensitive issues involved. Much of the information is classified and, frankly, we do not know much about it. I understand the concern that the Senator has on this matter. This subject, as I have told him, will be the subject of special hearings by the Intelligence Committee. The committee will do everything it can to investigate this matter, and make the record of that investigation known to the extent that it can.

As I said, I have discussed this with my very distinguished cochairman whom I rely on greatly, and he has agreed to it. I can assure the Senator that it will be an exhaustive hearing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, may I simply echo the statement of our distinguished chairman. The committee would be happy to undertake the inquiry that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts asked.

I would like to make one statement, however; that is, that the committee has not been indifferent in the least to this question, and has learned as much as we have been able to. Nothing that we have learned would in any way implicate the Central Intelligence Agency in the undoubtedly obscene and outrageous behavior of individuals and organizations in El Salvador. If we can learn more, we will and we will so report.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I want to express my very deep sense of appreciation to the Senator from Arizona and to the Senator from New York. Obviously, there are materials which are classified. But I think the basic issue is fundamental concern to the American people. I would be glad to work with the chairman and the ranking member of that committee to try to at least resolve as many of these issues and questions in the minds of the American people and the Congress, quite frankly, in as a candid and open way as possibly can be done.

Mr. President, with those assurances that have been given by the chairman of the committee and the ranking minority member, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JEPSEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 2883

(Purpose: To require the President to report to Congress on the whereabouts of U.S. provided military equipment)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY) proposes an amendment numbered 2883.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place in House Joint Resolution 492, add the following: "Within 120 days of the enactment of this legislation, The President shall transmit to Congress a classified and unclassified version of a report on the whereabouts of military equipment transferred since 1980 from the United States to the Government of El Salvador, and the whereabouts of Salvadoran military personnel trained with U.S. military aid funds."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, if I could have the attention of the floor manager, I will briefly state the reasons for this particular amendment.

The reason for this particular amendment, as the chairman of the committee understands, is that the Under Secretary of Defense, Mr. Ikle, told the House Appropriations Committee on March 27 that as much as 50 percent of the guerrilla arms and 20 percent of their ammunition was captured or taken from Salvadoran troops.

Two days later Ambassador Pickering said at a news conference that he rejected that estimate, claiming it was based on a study from only one region. Ambassador Pickering cited a study of 200 captured guerrilla weapons which found only 5 could be traced to weapons supplied by the United States to the Salvadoran armed forces. At last report, he stood by his remarks. Roughly one-third to one-half of those identified as American-made were Vietnam vintage, the Ambassador said.

Hopefully, with this amendment, Mr. Ikle and Mr. Pickering can resolve their differences and we can gain information, to the extent possible, as to the whereabouts of various military equipment that we have provided from American taxpayer funds.

That is the purpose of this amendment. I had a more elaborate amendment on this issue of accountability. I have talked with the chairman of the subcommittee about that, and he has given us an indication that we would make an attempt to the extent possible, to provide information within 120 days, as to the whereabouts of various American military equipment.

If that was acceptable to the chairman of the committee, that would be acceptable to me.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that certain articles relating to these disparities be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALVADOR REBELS SAID TO USE U.S. ARMS

(By Hedrick Smith)

WASHINGTON, March 27.—A top Defense Department official said today that roughly half of the arms used by Salvadoran guerrillas were United States supplied weapons taken from the armed forces of El Salvador.

The official, Fred C. Iklé, Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, said, however, that more United States military aid was urgently needed to help the Salvadoran Army break what he termed a military stalemate, "turn the corner" against the guerrillas, and ultimately gain a victory over the guerrillas.

Representative Clarence D. Long, Democrat of Maryland, chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Foreign Operations, asked Mr. Iklé for an evaluation of hitherto undisclosed official estimates that half of the arms used by the Salvadoran guerrillas "are weapons gotten from the Salvadoran military."

"Correct," Mr. Iklé replied. "The guerrillas, or a substantial part of their equipment, their arms, stems from those that they've been able to take away, capture or acquire by other means from the Salvadoran armed forces. This is not unexpected in a guerrilla warfare of this kind. But action has to be taken against it.

ARMS FROM CUBA AND SOVIET

Mr. Iklé added that the Administration believed that 80 percent of the ammunition and explosives used by Salvadoran guerrillas came from Cuba and the Soviet Union through Nicaragua and only about 20 percent is captured from the Salvadoran Army.

The testimony came as President Reagan stepped up his call for quick legislative action on a proposal for $93 million in emergency military aid for El Salvador. The aid was needed now, the President declared, as "an insurance policy to protect against the chaos that would result from allowing anti-American Marxists to shoot their way to power in Central America."

On the advice of Senator Howard H. Baker Jr., the majority leader, the Administration has agreed for the time being to seek $61.75 million, which officials say would carry the Salvadoran Army until the end of June. Senator Baker put off a vote on that package until Wednesday.

But Speaker of the House Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. warned that House Democrats were not sympathetic to the package. "I doubt very much that the bill will pass the House," Mr. O'Neill said today. "The majority of Democrats out there are opposed to any military funding. That's my feeling."

DEMOCRATS ARE WARY

Many Democrats are wary of voting more aid before knowing the winner of the second round of the Salvadoran presidential elections. They are also hesitant to support large foreign aid funds in an election year.

A sample of Democratic objections came today when Mr. Long, who has previously played a key role in cutting Administration aid requests, declared, "I don't agree with pouring vast sums into a country where there's no light at the end of the tunnel and when substantial amounts of arms are gotten by the guerrillas from Government armed forces."

Representative Bob Livingston, Republican of Louisiana, accused Mr. Long and other Democrats of "nickel-and-diming" El Salvador by voting only enough funds to keep the war going but not enough to win it.

URGE QUICK ACTION

"Those people are crying out for our support and we are denying it and we are involved in nit-picking up here while those people down there are being killed in a regular basis," Mr. Livingston shouted.

The main argument for quick action was made by Langhorne A. Motley, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs. The Administration, he said, could not wait until this summer for action on its main request last February for $178.7 million more military aid this year.

"We have no time to lose," he asserted. "El Salvador needs supplies now, not just next summer."

But Mr. Long pressed Mr. Iklé on the motivation, morale, retention rates and leadership of the Salvadoran Army until he finally drew out the estimate about the army's loss of arms to the guerrillas.

SALVADORAN ARMS LOSSES UNCERTAIN

(By Rick Atkinson)

Administration officials yesterday offered confusing and apparently conflicting estimates on the extent to which leftist guerrillas in El Salvador are armed with U.S.-made weapons captured from Salvadoran government troops.

In a news conference at the State Department, Thomas R. Pickering, U.S. ambassador to El Salvador, said that only 7 percent of U.S.-supplied weapons "are lost to the guerrillas." Those losses do not appear to provide a major portion of the leftists' arsenal, he said.

A Pentagon official, who asked not to be identified, put the figure at 6 percent.

But Fred C. Ikle, undersecretary of defense for policy, stood by his assertion Tuesday to the House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations that as much as 50 percent of the guerrillas' weapons has been captured from U.S.-supplied government forces.

Roughly 10 percent of the government's arms have been captured by the leftists "from overrunning, theft, whatever," Ikle added.

"The estimate that roughly half of the rebel arms have been captured from the government is based on a study from one region in El Salvador during a limited time period, so it is not that solid," he admitted. "But in any event, what may be half for the insurgents may be 10 percent for the government forces, since they are larger. A bank robber may steal half his assets from the bank but it may be only 10 percent of the bank's assets."

Pickering said, "Fred based his statement on a study of one part of El Salvador for a limited period. * * * It is not valid for the whole country."

An analysis of 200 captured guerrilla weapons found that only five could be traced to U.S.-supplied government troops, Pickering said. Some of the weapons were not traceable because serial numbers had been filed off, but roughly one-third to one-half of those identified as American-made were Vietnam vintage, the ambassador added.

Ikle and Pickering agreed that some of the American-made arms apparently were supplied to the leftists by Vietnam, which captured a large stockpile of U.S. munitions when South Vietnam was overrun. Other American-made weapons used by the leftists were supplied to the Nicaraguan National Guard before the overthrow of the late dictator Anastasio Somoza, Ikle added.

Most of the guerrillas "consumables, particularly ammunition, comes largely from communist sources, from Nicaragua or through Nicaragua—maybe as much as four-fifths," Ikle said.

NO BEDROCK OF FACTS FOUND ON EL SALVADOR

(By Joanne Omang)

When President Reagan got into trouble on Social Security and the MX missile, he named bipartisan advisory commissions to find a concensus and bail him out. It worked.

So when he got into trouble on aid to Central America he also named a commission—but this time it has not worked so far.

A major goal of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America headed by former secretary of state Henry A. Kissinger was to establish a factual bedrock upon which all sides might stand to argue.

Listening to the arguments between administration officials and their critics, and to the debate over aid now peaking in Congress, it is clear only that nothing is clear, that the commission report settled little, that the facts remain as much in dispute as ever.

It is not a debate, in fact, so much as a war for the label of truth.

"More and more of our money is going down there into a situation that seems to be deteriorating," Rep. Clarence D. Long (D-Md.) said at a hearing of his House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations last week. His view, typical of most critics, is that death squad murders continue in El Salvador; the judicial system is inert; troops desert and sell their arms to the guerrillas; the Salvadoran army is corrupt and recruits by dragging young men off the street.

"No," repled Langhorne A. (Tony) Motley, assistant secretary of state for Inter-American affairs. Less and less money is going down there, and in spite of that, "the situation is improving," he said. Death squad murders are on the decline; there is progress in the courts and the Salvadoran army is doing much better. It is a "canard" and "a disinformation campaign" that the troops sell their weapons; it is the guerrillas who desert and who get their recruits through press-gangs.

That is administration supporters' basic argument on these issues:

The amount of funding depends on what one counts. Long cited the upward march of U.S. spending from a variety of accounts, including emergency draw-downs, since 1980. Motley cited only congressional appropriations and the set-asides that have eaten into those funds by making aid conditional on Salvadoran actions that have yet to occur.

From Long's viewpoint, more than $1 billion has gone to help El Salvador fight leftist guerrillas, who somehow seem no weaker because of it. From Motley's side, the money has come in fits and starts that cripple planning and Salvadoran confidence. The debate in the Senate this week will focus on how much more money is needed to do what.

Body counts are notoriously difficult. Long cited a figure of 38,000 "murders of civilians by government forces since 1975" from Tutela Legal, a legal aid arm of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese in San Salvador. The State Department recently circulated a January cable from the U.S. Embassy in El Salvador saying 80 percent of those deaths are "battlefield casualties," civilians either caught in crossfires or killed while "traveling with" guerrilla groups. The latter, it said, are "something more than innocent bystanders."

State argues that these deaths cannot be called human rights violations. The remaining death squad killings, Motley said, "are down no matter whose figures you use."

A report from Americas Watch, a human rights group critical of Reagan's policies, agrees that such narrowly defined deaths are down, but notes that soldiers continue to drag people from their homes, and notes that, in contrast to the situation in El Salvador, the administration refers to "battlefield casualties" from Soviet army operations in Afghanistan as "a slaughter."

In fact, the political affiliations of both the killed and killers are often obscure, and the circumstances of death are even more so.

The Salvadoran judicial system has failed to bring anyone charged with murdering four American churchwomen in 1980 to trail, has failed to charge anyone with murdering three land reform workers in 1981 and has failed to do much of anything about thousands of Salvadoran murder cases.

An independent analysis for the State Department by retired judge Harold R. Tyler Jr. said the system was near collapse and recommended police protection for Salvadoran lawyers, judges and witnesses to promote honest trials.

However, the Salvadoran government, with U.S. aid, is setting up a criminal investigations unit; the police now claim to keep public records on arrests, and U.S. Ambassador Thomas R. Pickering said trials should begin in April for the churchwomen's accused murderers. There is movement, Motley said.

Army and guerrilla leaders minimize their desertion rates and deny they recruit by force. Both sides have produced deserters from the opposition and peasants who claim to have been coerced into signing up. Soldiers and guerrillas appear drunk on duty now and then.

The guerrilla left trumpets its spectacular bridge-blastings, its takeovers of key Salvadoran military posts and its unfettered romp through some areas supposedly under government control, and says it is clear that U.S.-trained troops (15 percent of the Salvadoran forces) have made no difference. The rebels, critics say, are slowly winning the military conflict.

However, the Army high command has reorganized, some inept colonels have been removed, new U.S.-trained noncommissioned officers are percolating through the ranks and Motley, who acknowledged that army reenlistment rates were less than 30 percent before 1982, said they are now up to 33 percent because of pay incentives.

The extent of arms sales by soldiers to guerrillas is probably unknowable. Soldiers are aware that if they surrender rather than fight, the rebels will take their guns, give them a political lecture and set them free.

Defense Undersecretary Fred C. Ikle estimated that half the guerrillas' arms, but only a fifth of their ammunition, is captured or taken from Salvadoran troops. But the administration backtracked later, saying that finding was based only on one small study.

To decide from these facts whether the situation is deteriorating or improving is obviously difficult. In such a small, riven country, there is no detached scholar or independent "think tank" to consult for dispassionate analysis. All the actors have their cheering sections, many paid handsomely and discreetly.

To survive where turf changes military hands daily, peasants understandably support the current victor and will often tell visiting gringos what they think the questioner wants to hear.

In the debate over El Salvador, the two sides continue talking past each other because each got different answers—ones they wanted to hear—in their search for "facts." Now neither side is listening to the other.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, it is my understanding that the Senator has changed his original amendment so that in effect we would have 120 days to report on the whereabouts of military equipment transferred since 1980 from the United States to the Government of El Salvador.

Frankly, although I think we are getting more reports than we need or maybe can use, with the changed amendment the Senator has brought forward, the change as to the specificity of that report, I would be willing to accept the Senator's amendment. I would also be prepared to yield back the remainder of my time at this time if the Senator would be willing to yield back the remainder of his time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, with those assurances, recognizing both the hour and the nature of the vote, I will say that I appreciate the accommodation of the Senator from Wisconsin, and I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 2883) was agreed to.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, may I address a question to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I yield.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to indicate he would offer no more amendments on this subject?

Mr. KENNEDY. With regard to El Salvador, the Senator is correct. I would hope tomorrow to be able to offer amendments on Nicaragua, and hopefully cosponsor an amendment to be offered by the Senator from Vermont, Senator LEAHY, which he and several others will be offering. That amendment relates to the War Powers Act and will relate to El Salvador. That is in the process of being drafted at the present time.

Mr. President, to the best of my knowledge, that will be the only other amendment which I would cosponsor on El Salvador.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I was addressing an amendment dealing with suspending deportation of Salvadoran refugees in the United States.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, that amendment originally was to be offered by the Senator from Arizona, Senator DECONCINI. He is out of the country at the present time. I have no intention of calling up that amendment in his absence. I have so indicated.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, would it be in order for me at this time, in view of that statement, to specifically delete that amendment from the time agreement?

Mr. KENNEDY. I would have no objection. I will be glad to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. We would like to have it stricken from the time agreement, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I do not mean to interfere with my good friend from Wisconsin, but many people are asking us if there will be an opportunity for further amendments that we might have votes on.

Is the Senator from New York seeking a vote on his amendment?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator is not. The Senator understands his amendment will be accepted.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he can give some guidance to the Senate as to whether he believes we will have other amendments this evening that can be called up?

Mr. KASTEN. With the understanding that the Senator from Massachusetts is withdrawing the amendmnt on behalf of the Senator from Arizona, I think it is unlikely that we will have further record votes.

Mr. President, I would like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts. We have been able to work together in terms of trying to put this set of amendments into some kind of reasonable schedule. I wonder if the Senator would say if he would be prepared now to try to look forward to a time certain by which we could complete the bill tomorrow, with the idea that the Honduras and the Nicaragua amendments would occur, and also I am assuming that the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) would occur. This is for the purpose of trying to do a little scheduling.

Mr. President, I would like to explore the possibility of a time certain that we can complete this legislation.

Mr. KENNEDY. That question probably ought to be directed to the minority leader. I do not think we can set that at this particular time, but I would think we made good progress during the course of today. I see no reason why we cannot make equally good progress with regard to the remaining amendments on Nicaragua and perhaps Honduras, and the remaining probably two amendments that I know of on El Salvador.

Because of the other sponsors of these amendments, I would feel constrained to object to an agreement at this time. I feel confident we will probably make very substantial progress tomorrow.

AMENDMENT NO. 2884

(Purpose: To provide funds for assistance to El Salvador to protect participants in the criminal proceedings in the churchwomen's case)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment on my behalf and that of the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), the Senator from Delaware (Mr. BIDEN), the Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. BRADLEY), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SPECTER), and the Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), for himself, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. DANFORTH, proposes an amendment numbered 2884.

On page 4, insert between lines 18 and 19 the following: "Notwithstanding section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, for an additional amount for necessary expenses for assistance to the Government of El Salvador to protect jurors and other key participants in the criminal proceedings against those charged with the murders of four American churchwomen, during and subsequent to such proceedings, $500,000."

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, this amendment to the urgent supplemental appropriations bill would affirm the determination of the United States that the trial of the Salvadoran national guardsman charged with the 1980 murders of four American churchwomen take place without undue delay and that a verdict be reached without taint of intimidation or corruption.

The amendment would appropriate an additional $500,000 for assistance to the Government of El Salvador for the protection of jurors and other key participants in these proceedings, both during and subsequent to the trial.

Mr. President, I believe this matter is one that can be readily agreed to by the Senate. We face in El Salvador a situation new to our sense of proceedings of law and justice. Our State Department January 16, 1984, situation report on El Salvador, as I stated, refers to "the lack of respect and faith in the law and effective collapse of the administration of criminal justice."

"The effective collapse of the administration of criminal justice."

Mr. President, this is a system which manages a conviction rate of only 10 to 20 percent in nonsensitive murder and other felony cases, much less major national issues, cases which involve major national forces and fundamental issues in the nature of the regime in that country. The U.S. Government, for some years now, has had a successful program of protecting witnesses in Federal trials in this country.

We propose to give the Department of Justice, which has worked so very well in this matter, resources by which they could insure that jurors and other participants in the trial can be provided protection if that is their desire and if we judge it is their need.

Mr. President, I have spoken to President Magana about the prosecution of the five former national guardsmen who have been charged with these crimes. I consider this case a major test of Salvadoran resolve to make its woefully deficient judicial system work—a system which has been plagued by the ever present potential for intimidation and corruption. It is in the interests of both our countries that justice be done in this case. He agreed.

Unfortunately, it is the reality of El Salvador that its own leaders cannot be confident that justice will be done, especially in cases with political overtones. As I noted, the Salvadoran criminal justice system which manages a conviction rate of only 10 to 20 percent even in relatively minor criminal cases.

The military exerts a significant influence in Salvadoran society. It is relatively rare to have a prosecution of military personnel in civil courts for crimes committed on duty. Whether a jury can be assembled and have the courage to vote their consciences remains an open and most troubling question. In this connection, the State Department's January 16 report made this comment concerning the Salvador judicial system in general, but it appears especially applicable to the churchwomen's case:

The problem of intimidation is subtle and pervasive. Adjudication of a compliant against a Security Force member, for example, would simply be assumed to court a risk of retaliation, even if unstated. In this climate, physical security measures for participants in sensitive cases—judges, lawyers, jurors, witnesses—are necessary and urgent. There are now none.

Mr. President, I cannot understate the distressful circumstances in El Salvador. Nor can I understate the importance of the case against those charged with murdering the churchwomen proceeding to trial—a trial which must be insulated to the maximum extent possible from intimidation. The successful conduct of such a trial cannot but be considered a critical test of the resolve of El Salvador to establish the rule of law. A failure will do far more than dash the hopes of the families and friends of the other Americans murdered in El Salvador that their killers will be apprehended and brought to justice: It will raise serious doubts whether El Salvador is capable of achieving any substantive progress toward reform.

I believe that the distinguished manager of the legislation and our revered Senator from Mississippi can accept this amendment and if they will do so, I shall be much in their debt.

Mr. President, I may say that many, many groups in our country who are concerned that this trial do take place, as indeed, we expect it to take place by the end of May, would be grateful as well.

It was these concerns that prompted my introduction on January 27 of Senate Joint Resolution 216, the "Declaration of United States Policy Concerning Human Rights in El Salvador." It would affirm our Nation's determination to take all measures necessary and appropriate to assure that those responsible for the murders in El Salvador of U.S. citizens are brought to justice. In furtherance of this prupose, it would authorize the President to provide assistance to El Salvador for the protection of participants in prosecutions of such murders and improvements in its judicial system.

As I have indicated, that joint resolution addresses the need to bring to justice those who kill any Americans in El Salvador. Ten such cases, including the four churchwomen were discussed in the State Department's January 16 situation report. The amendment I now offer deals only with the churchwomen's case which, I believe, is considered by all to be the most compelling and, above all, a test case. It is most appropriate, therefore, to treat of it in this urgent supplemental appropriations bill for El Salvador.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text fo Senate Joint Resolution 216 and my remarks upon introducing it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the materials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 216

Whereas there are two separate armed conflicts raging in El Salvador, one pitting persons seeking democratic government and reform against those trying to frustrate these efforts through use of death squads and other violations of basic human values, the other involving guerrillas—supported by Nicaragua, Cuba, and ultimately the Soviet Union—seeking to overthrow the Government of El Salvador;

Whereas demonstrable progress by El Salvador toward democratic reform and respect for human rights is essential if it is successfully to resist subjugation by Marxist-Leninist revolutionaries;

Whereas at least nine United States citizens, including four churchwomen, have been murdered in El Salvador in the past few years;

Whereas the investigations and prosecutions of these, as well as other crimes, have been plagued by a criminal justice system which is woefully inefficient and susceptible to political pressure, intimidation, and corruption: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is the policy of the United States to insist on respect for human rights in El Salvador and, in furtherance of such policy, the United States is determined to take all measures which may be necessary or appropriate to assure that those responsible for the murders in that country of United States citizens, including four American churchwomen, are brought to justice.

SEC. 2. In furtherance of the purposes of section 1, and notwithstanding section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the President is authorized to provide assistance to El Salvador for the protection of participants in the prosecutions of those charged with the murders of the American churchwomen and other United States citizens.

SEC. 3. Notwithstanding section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the President is authorized to provide assistance to El Salvador for programs and projects to promote the creation of judicial investigative capabilities, protection for key participants in pending judicial cases, and modernization of penal and evidentiary codes.

SEC. 4. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of sections 2 and 3.

SEC. 5. This joint resolution may be cited as the "Declaration of United States Policy Concerning Human Rights in El Salvador".

STATEMENT OF SENATOR DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN ON SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 216, TITLED "DECLARATION OF UNITED STATES POLICY CONCERNING HUMAN RIGHTS IN EL SALVADOR"

Mr. President, I rise to introduce a resolution which would provide a clear and unequivocal declaration that the United States will insist on respect for human rights in El Salvador. In furtherance of this purpose, it would require the President to take all measures which may be necessary or appropriate to assure those responsible for the brutal murders of four American churchwomen and other U.S. citizens are brought to trial. To this end, the President would be authorized to provide protection for the participants in the judicial process. This measure also includes a broader authorization to permit U.S. assistance to El Salvador to improve the professionalism and human rights performance of its criminal justice system.

Mr. President, of the problems plaguing that turbulent region of the world we call Central America, none are more complex and challenging than those in El Salvador. In saying this, I do not wish to be understood as failing to credit Nicaragua for its destabilizing influence in this isthmus. The Sandinista government—intent as it is on exporting its Marxist-Leninist revolution to its neighbors—is the major direct source of the tumult in the area. But there, at least, our adversaries and their intentions are readily discerned—which tends to make our choices among possible policies at once narrower and somewhat easier to make. We cannot but respond firmly to Nicaraguan violations of the OAS Charter's prohibition on intervention in the affairs of other nations.

While the situation is not better in Nicaragua than in El Salvador, it is surely simpler. Whereas Nicaragua's fundamentally democratic revolution was captured and dishonored by totalitarians thereby prompting an insurgency, El Salvador is a fledgling democracy being torn apart by two civil wars in which the motivations and frequently the identities of the various participants and factions are unclear or unknown. Moreover, even if the Sandinistas were to cease their support for guerrillas in El Salvador, the deprivation and strife would surely continue.

El Salvador has been embroiled in violent conflicts since 1979. One of these conflicts pits persons seeking democratic government and reform against those trying to frustrate these efforts through use of deathsquads and other violations of basic human values. The second involves guerrillas—backed by Nicaragua and Cuba—who seek the overthrow of the Salvadoran government. Terrorist tactics have been widely employed by both the right and left wing factions. Undisciplined military and security forces have committed murders and other abuses. The fragile democratic institutions cannot long survive this kind of dual assault. There has been some progress, but the path travelled has been a tortuous one. Despair seems to be the constant companion on hope.

One cannot visit El Slavador without developing a case of melancholy. I was there in December as part of a trip to Central America which also took me to Honduras, Costa Rica and Nicaragua. One can see something of the character of the countries in the cathedrals in their capitals. To call the one in San Salvador austere is to flatter it. While the country is without doubt poor, it is not so poor that its oligarchs would be unable to provide the funds required to give the cathedral the most basic of whitewashes. (Indeed, Honduras is a much poorer nation and yet its national cathedral is obviously meticulously cared for.) However, at least the cathedral San Salvador stood, in contrast to Managua which lost its cathedral in an earthquake and replaced it with votive lights and icons depicting its new "saints," Sandino and the founders of the FSLN. But how long can the Salvadoran edifice endure? It has already withstood the assassination of an Archbishop while saying Mass. How much more can it take? The final, awful prophecy of William Butler Yeats' poem, "The Second Coming," came to mind:

"Things fall apart;
The centre cannot hold;
Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world."

This country named after the Savior is, indeed, in direful need of one. However, it will have to find the stuff of salvation from within.

While the United States can provide important assistance, there are limits to what it can achieve. If El Salvador wishes to see its way through the woods, its leaders must end the right-wing deathsquads and the abuses of civil liberties by its army and security forces. I put this proposition: If Salvadoran democracy cannot be protected from the predators on the right, it surely will not withstand the assault from the left. The center must hold.

I spoke to President Magana about the brutal 1980 murders of four American churchwomen in his country and the prosecution of the five former national guardsmen who have been charged with these crimes. I consider this a major test of Salvadoran resolve to make its woefully deficient judicial system work—a system which has been plagued by the ever present potential for intimidation and corruption. It is in the interests of both our countries that justice be done in this case. He agreed.

Unfortunately, it is the reality of El Salvador that its own leaders cannot be confident that justice will be done, especially in cases with political overtones. Our State Department's January 16, 1984 situation report on El Salvador refers to the "lack of respect and faith in the law" and the "effective collapse of the administration of criminal justice"—a system which manages a conviction rate of only 10 to 20 percent even in less sensitive cases of murder and other felonies.

While I was on my trip, press articles appeared which commented on the Tyler Commission Report on the churchwomen's case. The New York Times (December 14, 1983) said that the Report rebuts criticism that the Administration failed to press for swift prosecution of the case. From my review of the matter, I can say that our government has indeed pressed the case. It is my opinion that without the pressure from our government, the prosecution would not have gone forward.

The Times also said that the Tyler Report found "substantial evidence" that the five national guardsmen arrested are guilty of the murders, but "expressed concern that political pressures in El Salvador would undermine the government's ability to bring the murderers to justice."

It is important to keep in mind that the military exerts a significant influence in society and that it is relatively rare to have a prosecution of members of the Salvadoran military in civil courts for crimes committed on duty. Whether a jury can be assembled and have the courage to vote their consciences remains an open and most troubling question. In this connection, the State Department's January 16 report made this comment concerning the Salvador judicial system in general, but it appears especially applicable to the churchwomen's case:

"The problem of intimidation is subtle and pervasive. Adjudiction of a complaint against a Security Force member, for example, would simply be assumed to court a risk of retaliation, even if unstated. In this climate, physical security measures for participants in sensitive cases—judges, lawyers, jurors, witnesses—are necessary and urgent. There are now none."

Mr. President. I cannot understate the distressful circumstances in El Salvador. Nor can I understate the importance of the case against those charged with murdering the churchwomen proceeding to trial—a trial which must be insuiated to the maximum extent possible from intimidation. The successful conduct of such a trial cannot but be considered a critical test of the resolve of El Salvador to establish the rule of law. A failure will do far more than dash the hopes of the families and friends of the other Americans murdered in El Salvador that their killers will be apprehended and brought to justice: It will raise serious doubts whether El Salvador is capable of achieving any substantive progress toward reform.

Mr. President, the joint resolution I offer affirms that it is United States policy to insist on respect for human rights in El Salvador and our nation's determination to take all measures that may be necessary or appropriate to bring to justice the persons responsible for the murders of the churchwomen and other U.S. citizens.

Section 2 of the resolution specifically authorizes the President to provide assistance to El Salvador for the protection of participants in the prosecutions of those charged with the murders of the churchwomen and other U.S. citizens. It would be for the President to determine the particular type of assistance. However, he would have an array of options at his disposal, which might include teaching the Salvadorans the security techniques employed in our Justice Department's witness protection program, such as relocation assistance. Funds for the purpose could be drawn from the $3 million authorized in the Continuing Resolution for Fiscal Year 1984 for, among other things, projects in El Salvador to promote "protection for key participants in pending judicial cases." (Section 101(b)(1), Public Law 98-151.)

Section 3 would provide a standing authorization for the President to give assistance to El Salvador for programs and projects to promote the creation of judicial investigative capabilities, protection for key participants, in pending judicial cases, and modernization of penal and evidentiary codes. As indicated the current authority will expire at the end of this fiscal year.

Section 4 provides an authorization for appropriations necessary to carry out sections 3 and 4.

Mr. President, I strongly urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, we have had an opportunity to review the amendment of the Senator from New York. I am prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished manager of the legislation. I move adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. KASTEN. I yield back the time on my side.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I yield back my time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The amendment (No. 2884) was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, the next amendment to be considered is the amendment of the Senator from California (Mr. WILSON) on which no time limit has been agreed to. I ask unanimous consent that debate on the Wilson amendment be limited to 30 minutes equally divided.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I will have to object; not with respect to my own feeling do I have to object at the present time but for the protection of someone else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I will withhold that unanimous-consent request and simply yield the floor to the Senator from California so that he may submit his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 2885

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill clerk read as follows:

The Senator from California (Mr. WILSON) proposes an amendment numbered 2885:

Insert at the appropriate place:

On Sunday, March 25, 1984, a remarkable exercise in democracy in the conduct of a free and honest election within the Republic of El Salvador took place, with approximately 70 percent participation by eligible voters despite intense guerrilla efforts to intimidate and to sabotage the election.

Since the success of the Government of El Salvador in the conduct of this election against the guerrilla efforts to disrupt and invalidate it depended both upon the courage, good spirits and determination of the Salvadoran people to freely choose their President and Vice-President, and upon the ability of Salvadoran armed forces to safeguard voters and election officials against the guerrillas; and

Since within 30 days of certification of the results of the March 25 election a run-off election is required under the Salvadoran Constitution and election law, since no candidate won a majority of the vote at the March 25 election; and

Since the armed forces of El Salvador, unless immediately resupplied by the U.S. with equipment, arms, and ammunition which are in critically short supply, are threatened with being unable to provide the same needed protection for the run-off election, and with suffering generally a dangerously reduced capacity to safeguard the Salvadoran people against the terrorism of the guerrillas;

Therefore, the Senate finds that the policy of the United States should be to immediately provide such additional equipment, arms, and ammunition as will allow the armed forces of El Salvador to provide needed protection to the Salvadoran people both at the run-off election and in their daily lives; and ultimately to so suppress guerrilla terrorism as to make possible the revival of economic activity with El Salvador.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I think the amendment is self-explanatory. It is a simple narrative of the facts as they have unfolded with respect to the conduct of the Salvadoran election, and it is a statement of fact with respect to the requirement that that election be safeguarded and that the runoff election which will follow, to determine the new President and Vice President of El Salvador, be safeguarded in similar fashion. It is a tragic requirement but nonetheless a very real requirement.

There is abundant documentation of the need, and perhaps the most eloquent and clearest statement of it came from the guerrillas themselves, who have made known by action and by manner that they would have no part of this election and, in fact, sought to disrupt it, to discredit it, and to invalidate it, presumably because of their fear of allowing the Salvadoran people to choose their leadership in a free and fraud-free election.

The first step in that process has occurred. The second step will follow within a month. The finding is that the policy of the United States should be to permit that second step to occur. In addition, it should be the policy of this Nation to allow the people of that small, struggling democracy, who have made clear their hunger for democracy, to enjoy it without fear in their daily lives, which they cannot do unless they are similarly safeguarded.

A final point, but one that I think is worthy of our consideration, one that certainly occupied several hours of debate on this floor, has to do with the appropriateness of economic assistance for that troubled nation. Critics of the current administration's policy have contended that the wrong approach is being taken, that too much emphasis has been laid upon military intervention. Some have cried out on this floor passionately that a military solution is not possible. Mr. President, a military solution is required, if there is to be any hope, any realistic hope, of economic revival of the kind that every man and woman on this floor devoutly wishes for in El Salvador.

Over 800 million dollars' worth of damage to industrial property, to public infrastructure, and to agricultural produce have been suffered in the 4 years from 1980 to the present time. That is only the beginning, unless the Salvadoran army, representing the people of that nation, is able to so suppress guerrilla terrorism as to bring political stability to that nation of a kind that will allow the courageous to once again reinvest in El Salvador.

There can be no hope of economic revival, no hope of achieving the recommendations of the Kissinger Commission to reach its modest goal of restoring El Salvador's economy by 1990 to the level it enjoyed in 1980, unless we first achieve the kind of safety in the daily lives of the people of that country that will encourage those with a heart to do so to risk investing in it once again.

So, Mr. President, the simple words record unhappy facts; but contained within this narrative is also the bright hope of a people finding their way, choosing their leaders to lead them out of the darkness of these past 4 years and into the democracy which, if imperfect in our eyes, is a very real improvement on anything they have known, and one that gives promise of coming in the fullness of time to be a real, functioning democracy. Without the help that we are seeking for them, there is no prospect of economic revival. There is no prospect, therefore, for real democracy to take root in a land that is constantly devastated by terrorism and by sabotage.

Mr. President, those are simple statements of fact. I think they are beyond dispute. Again, the most eloquent and the clearest documentation that the facts are true and will continue to be true comes from the mouths of the guerrillas themselves, who have declared the electoral process a farce, who have indicated no desire to participate in it, beyond their efforts to disrupt it, to discredit it, and to invalidate it.

The courage of the Salvadoran people, their gritty determination to exercise their franchise, should be an inspiration to those more fortunate, those who take their democracy for granted. It would be a tragic disservice to them.

As observed by my colleague, the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BOREN), in very simple but eloquent terms, how can we turn our backs upon these people? They inspired him. They awakened in him a sense of American duty, the tradition of this Nation to help those who are willing to help themselves; and that is all these people are asking. They are not asking for American troops. They are asking for American military aid to do what they are disposed to do—protect themselves and their struggling democracy from the threat that emanates from the guerrillas who are directed from Managua.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this resolution. I think it simply states in clear terms what we have implied in these prior votes. It is necessary for us to provide sufficient military aid to bring about safety in El Salvador, if continued economic assistance is not to be a vain and fatuous waste of money. We can pour money down a sinkhole, we can see bridges blown and powerlines cut indefinitely, unless the people of that nation are given sufficient armed force to deal with that threat.

Mr. President, how much of my time remains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no time remaining.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Chair.

I thank the distinguished manager.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the amendment?

There being no further discussion, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to place the question before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further debate on the amendment, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California.

The amendment (No. 2885) was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I believe we are able now to announce there will be no more record votes this evening.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Here, here.

Mr. KASTEN. The next amendment in order is the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, and it is the hope of the managers of the bill that the Senator from Arkansas may be able to lay before the Senate his amendment yet this evening, possibly make some introductory remarks, and then we will go out with the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas being the pending business when we get back onto the bill tomorrow.

So, Mr. President, at this time I yield the floor.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I was just wondering if the distinguished floor manager and I might enter into an agreement if we know what time we are coming in tomorrow before laying this amendment down.

Do we know what time we are coming in tomorrow?

Mr. KASTEN. We are going to be coming in at 10 a.m. tomorrow morning. So there will be a period for special orders and time for the minority leader and majority leader. But the Senate will come in at 10 a.m. tomorrow morning.

So I assume we will be beginning the Senator's amendment sometime around 11:15 a.m. or 11:30 a.m. tomorrow morning. That would be after the other business is completed.

Mr. BUMPERS. Could we enter into a unanimous-consent agreement that we not go to the amendment prior to 11 a.m. and debate the amendment for 1 hour, with 30 minutes for each side?

Mr. KASTEN. My understanding is that presently the amendment has 2 hours equally divided. The Senator is suggesting 1½ hours equally divided?

Mr. BUMPERS. I would not mind leaving it at 2 hours for that matter and anticipate not taking that much time.

Mr. KASTEN. I misunderstood the Senator. He said 1 hour equally divided, one-half hour to each side.

Mr. BUMPERS. Yes. I think we can do it in an hour.

Mr. KASTEN. I will agree. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BUMPERS. Wait just a minute before we do that. I may be a little too generous. I consider this really to be a very important amendment on which a lot of people are going to be paying maybe a little more attention than they have to some of the others.

Let me suggest 1½ hours because there are two or three Senators who have asked me for time to speak.

So why do we not say 1½ hours equally divided, 45 minutes on either side, and hopefully we can finish it in less time than that?

Mr. KASTEN. I have no objection to that understanding, to that unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BUMPERS. I make that in the form of a unanimous-consent request then, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO 2886

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am going to send to the desk an amendment which is only a slight variant from the amendment previously filed, and ask that it be immediately considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arkansas (Mr. BUMPERS) for himself and Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SASSER, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. EXON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. DIXON, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. INOUYE proposes an amendment numbered 2886.

At the appropriate place in the bill, add the following new section:

"SEC. —. If at any time following the appropriation of funds herein the duly elected President of El Salvador should be prevented from taking office by military force or military decree or after taking office shall be deposed by military force or military decree, all funds appropriated herein for El Salvador and not theretofore obligated or expended shall not thereafter be available for obligation or expenditure unless approriate again by Congress."

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BUMPERS. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, as the Senator from Wisconsin indicated, there will be no more rollcall votes tonight. The Senate will convene at 10 a.m. tomorrow, assuming the request I will make will be agreed to and we should be back on this bill by 11 a.m. tomorrow. I thank the Senator.

As I understand the time agreement, that would make it possible for a vote on the Senator's amendment by noon, depending on the time we use tonight.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I am sorry, did the Senator make a unanimous-consent request about coming in tomorrow?

Mr. STEVENS. I said I will make a request later that we come in at 10 a.m. and go on the bill at 11.

Mr. BUMPERS. That is fine. It is conceivable that we could vote by 12 o'clock under that order.

Mr. President, I offer this amendment on behalf of myself, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SASSER, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. EXON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. DIXON, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. INOUYE.

Mr. President, this amendment is very simple. And I ought to say at the outset that there is already language in the bill that is almost precisely the same as this, except that it pertains to Panama and not El Salvador. Incidentally, that language was added in committee by the distinguished Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE).

I am not going to belabor this tonight because most of the debate appropriately ought to take place tomorrow. Everybody has taken their leave for this evening.

But this amendment is very simple. It is that if a duly-elected President of El Salvador is deposed or is prevented from taking office by military force or decree, than the unexpended sums for El Salvador as of that date under this bill shall be frozen until Congress reappropriates the money.

Now that does two things. It says that we are committed to democracy in El Salvador, and it says further that if there is a series of events there which are unforeseen and cannot possibly be predicted which might somehow mitigate our commitment to democracy, then Congress can have another look at this appropriation.

If we have a policy in El Salvador, which I think all Members of Congress will admit is elusive at best, but if we do have a policy it is that we are committed to the establishment of a stable government in El Salvador, we are committed to installing and nurturing democratic institutions in El Salvador; it is that we want to show the people of Central America that democracy is infinitely superior to communism, and one manifestation of that superiority is that the people rule.

I heard Senator BOREN and others who went down as a congressional delegation to witness the elections come back with very dramatic, poignant stories about the zeal with which the people of El Salvador approached those elections. I think it is important that we understand that those people are voting and they are voting their popular choices and they are also voting to stop the violence. And the only way you are ever going to stop the violence is if you have a popularly supported government.

Assume, on the one hand, that Napoleon Duarte is duly elected President. That is my personal wish, as I suspect it is most people's here. But if he is elected, if we expect him to carry out land reforms, install some kind of an embryonic judicial system, bring those who violate human rights to trial, as we speak endlessly about in this body, he must have some leverage. If a military commander is to be tried for violation of human rights or for being a member of some of the death squads, the military must understand that this must take place and that, simply because that commander is one of their own, they may not depose a duly elected president. It is some leverage for President Duarte.

Some have said to me, "Yes, but what if D'Aubuisson is elected, how will your amendment play out then? What if the good guys overthrow D'Aubuisson?"

My answer to that is you cannot have it both ways. There will be another appropriations process and if D'Aubuisson is that offensive to a majority of the Members of Congress, all you have to do is to cut off the funds the next time the appropriations process comes around.

I note that he is beginning to change his act, according to the reports in the Post and the Times, extending an olive branch to Duarte. And maybe he will have a change of character if, in fact, he needs to.

But you cannot say to the people of El Salvador that we are concerned about your vote and we want democracy there but it must be for the ones we want. If we are saying to these people we expect you to risk your lives to come into town on Sunday afternoon to vote and nurture this little incipient embryonic democracy that we hope will take root and bloom, but if you happen to vote in a way that displeases the Congress of the United States, then your vote will not count, that would be the cruelest of all hoaxes to play on the people.

Mr. President, I know that there are Senators who want to get home to their families and this will be debated again tomorrow. I have several other points to make, but with the consent of the floor manager I am prepared to wrap it up and begin the debate again tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute out of the debate on the bill.

I take this time just to ask the distinguished Senator from Arkansas whether or not he meant for that time to come out of his time. I think it would have and he may not have wanted that to happen.

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, the minority leader has asked a very cogent question. It was my understanding that the hour and a half would begin tomorrow at 11 a.m., but I was simply laying the bill down tonight and such time we put on it tonight would not be counted.

Mr. BYRD. That was agreeable with me, but I believe the time would have been charged against the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time would have been charged against the Senator under the amendment. However, time can be taken from the bill by unanimous consent.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may suggest the absence of a quorum without the time being charged to anyone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate adopted by voice vote an amendment conditioning continued aid to El Salvador on demonstrated progress in land reform. I believe this amendment is essential to achieving our broader goals in El Salvador and the Central American region as a whole.

As originally drafted, House Joint Resolution 492 made no reference to conditioning continued military aid to El Salvador on continued progress in Agrarian reform. We included this requirement in last year's continuing resolution. It was included in the recommendations of the Kissinger Commission. We should include it here as well.

Mr. President, I am convinced that the land reform program in El Salvador is critical to giving economic security to its primarily Agrarian people. I believe that land reform can act as a catalyst in the process of creating stability in the region. In poor rural countries the one critical reform that is likely to promote stability is land reform. If we are going to set conditions on the aid we give to El Salvador, I would hope that this is the first reform we insist on. Land reform is the basis for creating political stability.

It is in our interest to have stable and friendly governments close to our borders. That is the issue concerning El Salvador. Our policy toward El Salvador should be as follows: We will give you support, we will supply you with economic and military aid, and we will if necessary protect you against invasion by stronger greedy nations, but we cannot give your peasants the desire to support your country; only you can do that. And you can do it only if you undertake a timely and effective program of land reform.

There is hardly a more instructive situation in our recent history than the difference in land reform in Korea and in Vietnam. And this country owes a great debt of gratitude to Prof. Roy Prosterman of the University of Washington in Seattle who is without compare one of the world's leading authorities on land reform. He has traveled more, advised more, and done more to advance this cause than any other single person in my knowledge. His comments on Korea and Vietnam and their histories are most instructive. If you look at North and South Korea circa 1950 and North and South Vietnam circa 1960 or 65, it is interesting to note that of the four countries, if you count the two Koreas as two countries and the two Vietnams as two countries, the only one that had any indicia of what we might call democratic trappings was South Vietnam. At least they had some opposition press. They had religious leaders who would express opposition. They had minorities in their parliament that expressed opposition. This was not true in North or South Korea. South Korea after World War II under Syngman Rhee was as much a dictatorship as most other dictatorships that exist in the world today. But Syngman Rhee undertook some extraordinary steps that stood him in good stead when North Korea invaded South Korea in 1950.

You will recall that Korea had been occupied by Japan for the better part of the first half of this century. At the end of World War II the Japanese were expelled and Korea at last gained independence in its own right. It was divided at the 38th parallel, with the Communists holding control in the North and Syngman Rhee holding control in the South. President Rhee very quickly distributed to the peasants the lands that the Japanese had held. It can be said that that was an easy step because he did not have to take land from Korean owners. However, by 1950 President Rhee had gone even further and had undertaken a very broad land reform program including purchasing land from large and medium Korean landowners and thereupon transferring full ownership of that land to the vast number of families who had up to then been farming it as tenants. So by the time North Korea invaded in 1950 the land reform program in South Korea was in essence complete.

It is interesting to note that although the North initially had an overwhelming military advantage, because of their sudden thrust there was never, never any South Korean peasant support for the North Korean Army. There was no fifth column. There were no saboteurs. There was no Viet Cong in black pajamas sapping the strength of the Syngman Rhee government. The peasants, virtually universally, supported Syngman Rhee, not because he gave them democracy—he certainly did not do that—but because he had given them land. And because of their tenacious support for the South Korean Government and our military intervention on its behalf, the Government survived and today prospers as one of our strong allies.

Now move up 10 or 15 years to Vietnam. Again, I will emphasize that there were some trappings of democracy in South Vietnam—clearly not our Bill of Rights but more democracy than exists in any of the Communist countries and most of the fascist countries of this world today, but there was not land reform. When North Vietnam chose to invade—and I use that in the deliberate sense—just as North Vietnam chose to invade, what they found in South Vietnam was fertile ground for garnering grassroots peasant support for their violent revolutionary efforts.

When the United States intervened we promised the South Vietnamese peasant a constitution. The North Vietnamese promised them land. And it is easy to understand why they chose the latter rather than the former. Had the South Vietnamese Government simply had the presence of mind to do in time in South Vietnam what Syngman Rhee had done in South Korea, South Vietnam today would still be an existing nation, probably an ally of ours, probably an economic success. But they waited until it was too late—although even in 1971 to 1974 when land reform was finally carried out, Viet Cong, recruitment dropped from 5,000 to 7,000 men a month down to 1,000; and the Communists have not dared to collectivize those new peasant owners. But by the early 1970's there were masses of North Vietnamese troops present, and massive unhappiness with the war here. They waited too long, and they lost.

That brings us back full cycle to Latin America and El Salvador in particular.

Somehow, some way, Mr. President, we must convince the oligarchies in Latin America that the day of their owning immense plantations farmed by tenant farmers must be over. They must learn that they are going to move to the cities and become bankers or Sony dealers or Coca-Cola franchisees or operators of insurance companies and they must leave to the former tenant farmer and plantation laborer the land, so that this tenant farmer or laborer might own it, farm it, and possess it with the support of the country.

As for El Salvador, we wish that country well, but they must undertake the steps for their own Salvation. We can suggest: We can attempt to persuade. We cannot impose. Their future is in their hands. If they undertake the proper steps, they can and should expect our support: and if they do not, they should not get our support, because it will not do any good.

So, Mr. President, I welcome the inclusion of land reform in this bill as a condition for our continued aid to El Salvador. Including land reform as a condition for continued aid reaffirms our commitment to progress in this vital program.●

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The following petitions and memorials were laid before the Senate and were referred or ordered to lie on the table as indicated:

POM-594. A resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the State of Hawaii; to the Committee on Finance:

"HOUSE RESOLUTION

"Whereas, the State of Hawaii recognizes, as one of its primary objectives, the development of greater opportunities for Hawaii's people to secure reasonably priced housing; and

"Whereas, the increasingly high cost of constructing housing in Hawaii, coupled with high mortgage interest rates, makes it extremely difficult for moderate income families to purchase their first homes; and

"Whereas, in 1980 the Hawaii Housing Authority began its housing loan and mortgage program nicknamed the "Hula Mae" program to provide lower than market cost financing for first-time homeowners, and the Authority has since issued $381 million in tax-exempt revenue bonds, the proceeds of which have been used to finance mortgage loans enabling over 2,600 moderate income families to purchase residential units and these families would have been unable to purchase their homes without the tax-exempt bond program; and

"Whereas, the Mortgage Subsidy Bond Tax Act of 1980 prohibits state and local governments from issuing these revenue bonds after December 31, 1983, thereby jeopardizing the State's ability to further finance the purchase of housing by moderate income families; and

"Whereas, many in Congress have endorsed a permanent extension of the tax-exempt mortgage bond program, pointing to the program's benefits in enabling thousands of first-time home buyers to purchase their homes, the creation of thousands of new jobs in home construction and related industries, and the generation of hundreds of millions of dollars annually in additional tax revenues from the multiplier effects of home investment; now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twelfth Legislature of the State of Hawaii, Regular Session of 1984, That the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States are respectfully urged to support, in view of its great success, the continued use of tax-exempt revenue bonds as the primary source of funds for Hawaii's Hula Mae mortgage loan program and similarly successful programs in other states and cities either through the extension of the tax-exempt mortgage bond program or the repeal of the sunset clause of the Mortgage Subsidy Bond Tax Act of 1980; and

"Be it further resolved, That the President and Congress also be urged to recognize that income limitations under tax-exempt housing bond programs should be determined by the states, and not nationally set, due to the great variance of economic and other factors existent in the states, making nationally-set income limitations artificial and imprudent; and

"Be it further resolved, That certified copies of this Resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and each member of Hawaii's congressional delegation."

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. QUAYLE:

S. 2525. A bill entitled the "National Science Foundation Amendments of 1984"; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION AMENDMENTS OF 1984

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today to amend the National Science Foundation Act of 1950 to place more emphasis on activities related to basic engineering research. The legislation does not authorize any new expenditure of funds, rather it seeks to enhance the position of basic engineering research activities within the NSF.

At the outset I would like to state that this bill is in no way intended to emphasize engineering at the expense of science. The NSF has and does support basic scientific research which has resulted in many technological, chemical, biological and other scientific advances, necessary to keep our country competitive in industry and other fields.

This bill would clarify the status of fundamental engineering research within the NSF. Most people view basic scientific research as an appropriate area of Federal support and most people view applied research as the responsibility of industry and the private sector. What falls in between basic science research and applied research is often fundamental engineering research. This is research that generates future technology from scientific knowledge, through investigation of systems, manufacturing processes, materials and methods. Fundamental engineering research does not result in a product; it is generic in nature. Because of its general nature, fundamental engineering research lacks support from the private sector and yet has never been considered a part of basic science research and therefore is not supported by the Federal Government.

Additionally, the bill would make engineering education a priority for the agency. We have a serious shortage of engineeing faculty at our Nation's universities, as well as a shortage of undergraduate and graduate engineering students. The NSF has already acknowledged these shortages by increasing their support by funding 500 new and 1,000 continuing NSF graduate fellows. Additionally, the agency has initiated a Presidential Young Investigator Research Awards program, 100 of which will be awarded to promising engineers.

While these trends at NSF are encouraging, they are also indicative of the needs that exist. The bill I am introducing today will encourage the NSF to increase its support of basic engineering, and enable the agency to institutionalize engineering within itself, making clear that we, as a nation, are committed to producing a strong science and engineering base in order to compete more effectively in world markets.

I ask my colleagues to support this legislation in recognition of the importance of basic engineering research to our Nation's future.●

By Mr. PACKWOOD (for himself and Mr. STEVENS):

S. 2526. A bill to authorize appropriations for the Coast Guard for fiscal years 1985 and 1986, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

COAST GUARD AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1984

● Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation titled the "Coast Guard Authorization Act of 1984." This legislation authorizes appropriations for the Coast Guard for the 1985 and 1986 fiscal years, and is offered prior to committee hearings to be held on April 3.

The Coast Guard is truly a multimission force. As my colleagues well know, it is the principal maritime safety and law enforcement agency. Its missions include search and rescue, fisheries enforcement, antismuggling activities, vessel inspection, environmental protection, and operation of navigational aids.

The Coast Guard also plays a significant role in national defense. Coast Guard cutters have replaced the Navy in Grenada, its ships regularly participate in U.S. naval exercises, it provides port security in the United States and overseas, and it operates the only polar icebreakers possessed by any U.S. military service.

As new maritime problems have developed and old ones have expanded, Congress has been quick to look to the Coast Guard for solutions, and, the Coast Guard has always been there. Unfortunately, while the Coast Guard has always been ready to take on new and expanded missions, it has not always received the resources it needs. Coast Guard equipment and manpower shortages are well known to my colleagues. The number of Coast Guard cutters has declined by a third in the last decade and the average age of a cutter is over 27 years. The number of Coast Guard personnel has, at best, remained constant, while its duties expanded dramatically.

Congress has taken steps to reverse these trends. In 1982 and again in 1984, largely due to the efforts of my colleague, Senator STEVENS, we included funds in the Department of Defense appropriations bill for acquisition of Coast Guard equipment. The authorization bill I am submitting today continues the trend toward a newer, stronger Coast Guard. The bill authorizes spending of $2.4 billion in 1985. While this level exceeds the administration's request by $240 million, I believe every additional dollar is justified. Most of the additional money is for acquisition of new equipment. This new equipment is absolutely essential if we want the Coast Guard to adequately fulfill its many assigned missions.

Several other sections of the bill deserve special mention. Section 3 of the bill contains a provision to maintain Coast Guard civilian and military strength at last year's levels. Coast Guard personnel levels have dropped slightly in recent years, and the administration has proposed cutting 700 more positions in 1985. We cannot expect the Coast Guard to function adequately in the future if its personnel are gradually reduced.

Section 5 of the bill calls on the Secretary of Transportation to prepare plans for acquisition of two new polar icebreakers, and to report to Congress on the status of these plans in January 1985 and January 1986. The U.S. polar icebreaking capability today is minimal. The entire fleet consists of five vessels. Two of these vessels were built during World War II and a third was constructed in the early 1950's. Given the long leadtime needed to develop and construct a specialized vessel like an icebreaker, now is the time to begin planning for replacement of these old vessels.

Section 6 of the bill concerns safety defects in recreational boats. Current law requires boat manufacturers to notify dealers of life-threatening defects in their boats, and repair the defect at the manufacturer's expense. Unfortunately, the Coast Guard had found some unrepaired boats are sold after dangerous defects are discovered. This section halts that practice by barring the sale of boats with a known defect which creates a substantial risk of injury.

Section 8 of the bill concerns the San Francisco, Calif., vessel-traffic service. In light of a 1983 Department of Transportation study, stating that the vessel-traffic service "makes a significant contribution to vessel safety and traffic facilitation in the San Francisco Bay area and its adjoining waterways and ports," the section requires continuation of the service in 1985 and 1986. The section also prevents the Coast Guard from civilianizing the San Francisco vessel-traffic service until a study is conducted showing the benefits which would accrue to both the Federal Government and the users of the service. Replacing military with civilian personnel would likely increase the cost of the San Francisco operation to the Coast Guard. This section is strongly supported by shipowners and captains using San Francisco Bay.

Section 9 of the bill expresses support for contracting with private sources to provide Coast Guard services, which may be performed with equal effectiveness and at a lower cost by the private sector. The provision also insures that Congress will have a role in reviewing proposals to contract such services by requiring the Secretary of Transportation to submit a statement to Congress in advance of any contract proposal.

A December 1983 court of appeals case held it was permissible for a vessel owner to discriminate against or discharge a seaman who notified the Coast Guard of possibly dangerous conditions on the owner's vessel. Section 10 of the bill prohibits such actions by vessel owners or operators where the seaman acts in good faith.

Before concluding I want to interject a personal observation concerning the men and women who serve in the Coast Guard, the Coast Guard Reserve, and the Coast Guard Auxiliary. Since arriving in the Senate from Oregon in 1969, I have met commandants, and seamen, and all ranks in between. And I have learned that these folks daily provide the United States with service unmatched for its dedication, bravery, and selflessness. In short, they are patriots.

During Commerce Committee hearings I chaired in Oregon in January, I listened to Oregonians talk about the Coast Guard. While witnesses occasionally called for more coverage or better equipment, the testimony was always laudatory when it concerned Coast Guard personnel. We owe our full support to the men and women who serve in the Coast Guard, in Oregon and nationally. The authorization bill I am introducing today is an effort to provide that support and I hope all my colleagues in the Senate will join me in backing this legislation.●

By Mr. SYMMS (for himself and Mr. STAFFORD):

S. 2527. A bill to approve the interstate and interstate substitute cost estimates, to amend title 23 of the United States Code, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

FEDERAL AID HIGHWAY ACT OF 1984

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce legislation today which would approve both the interstate cost estimate (ICE) and the interstate substitute cost estimate (ISCE) for 18 months and also address certain transportation policy issues. I am hopeful that this 18-month ICE/ISCE approval will not prove as difficult and time-consuming to secure as the 6-month approval which finally was signed into law (Public Law 98-229) on March 9, 1984.

States have been forced to wait since October 1, 1983—over 5 months—for their interstate construction and interstate transfer funds as well as their 85 percent minimum allocation money. This happened despite the face that Congress had previously authorized this spending and taxpayers have been paying increased highway use fees since April 1, 1983 to finance that spending. Those taxes accumulated in the highway trust fund as month after month Congress failed to agree on other items which were extraneous to the vital ICE-ISCE approvals. Without that congressional approval, the U.S. Department of Transportation was prevented from distributing to State highway authorities nearly $5.4 billion in Federal funds for fiscal 1984.

We now face the need to approve the release of $1.6 billion in funds remaining for the current fiscal year, plus approximately $5.2 billion that should go out as of October 1, 1984.

The Transportation Subcommittee has recently concluded hearings on the implementation of the Surface Transportation Assistance Act of 1982 (STAA). Members heard extensive testimony on the need for an expeditious approval of an 18-month ICE and ISCE. I think the Associated General Contractors made the point well, by stating:

> Everyone recognizes that the commitments made by Congress in the 1982 STAA to rebuild our transportation infrastructure and combat unemployment were partially undermined by the recent 5 month delay in approving an ICE.
> The States' highway improvement programs and the highway construction industry can ill afford another prolonged period of uncertainty caused by delayed congressional approval of an interstate cost estimate. The ability of the States to program projects and conduct financial planning, the construction industry's need for a predictable and stable program within which to make cost-effective, long-term capital investments, the extent to which a smoothly-functioning highway improvement program can aid economic growth, and the basic right of the travelling public to a safe national highway system, are all compelling reasons for prompt congressional action on an "18-Month" ICE bill.

Now I would like to briefly describe the major provisions of this legislation. In addition to the 18-month interstate cost estimate approvals, the bill would release the remainder of the 85-percent minimum allocation funds. In order to avoid future delays, it would direct the Secretary of Transportation to make the necessary adjustments to the ICE and ISCE and then administratively proceed to apportion the funds each October 1. This would not prevent Congress from acting at any time to make changes, but it would help keep the program running on an even keel and avoid the stop-and-go problems we have seen this past year. This action would keep the States from being penalized and their highway programs from being severely disrupted. It would also assure the motoring public that the gasoline and other highway taxes they pay are being put to immediate use in the construction and repair of our highway system.

This bill addresses other policy concerns, including a Federal-State match on emergency relief funding, several bridge program issues, participation by Women Business Enterprises in the Federal-aid highway program, toll facilities, rail-highway crossings, right-of-way donation, and right-of-way payback.

The 1982 Highway Act allowed for a 50-percent increase in funding for the Federal-aid highway program, beginning with fiscal year 1983. This additional funding is urgently needed to build and rehabilitate our transportation infrastructure, and if it is to be truly cost effective, the funding must be provided to the States in an orderly, dependable manner.

The Transportation Subcommittee also recently heard testimony from Peter Koltnow, president of the Highway Users Federation, who observed:

> Taking a longer view of the Federal-aid highway program, there is a need to reaffirm—or restate—the appropriate Federal role. Highway users have understood that role to be one of stimulating the capital investment in a limited set of roads of national importance, based on user charge funding.
>
> Highway users were prominent for years preceding STAA 82 in building public support for the need to reinvest in our streets and roads.
> That strong support is apt to erode, however, in light of three trends evident in recent congressional action: funding projects of chiefly local interest, providing increasing funds off the Federal-aid road systems, and diversion of highway user taxes.

Along with increased funding for highways, there are an increasing number of needs and demands on the Federal-aid program. The Transportation Subcommittee will be considering this legislation soon, and it is my hope that we can indeed move expeditiously on the 18-month ICE/ISCE approvals and other essential highway issues.

I want to thank Chairman STAFFORD, and the ranking committee and subcommittee members, Senators RANDOLPH and BENTSEN. I know they all share my conern for the future health of the highway trust fund and the importance of preserving the Federal-aid highway program, so that it can continue to be one of our most respected, successful, national programs.

● Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. President, the primary purpose for the legislation being introduced today is to complete the two-step process which has become necessary this year if the interstate cost estimate (ICE) and the interstate substitute cost estimate (ISCE) are to be approved for a total of 2 years.

In early March—5 months into fiscal year 1984, a 6-month approval was finally enacted, permitting the U.S. Department of Transportation to release nearly $2.7 billion in interstate and related highway funds. I was very disappointed that we could not make a full year's Interstate funding available to the States. We are now at the beginning of the major construction season. Many States have already obligated the first half of the funds made available to them for fiscal 1984 and will be unable to begin major projects scheduled for this construction season if the second half of these funds are not made available very soon.

Those remaining funds total approximately $1.6 billion for the current fiscal year. It is money that has already been collected through the Federal gasoline and other highway use taxes. An additional $5.2 billion in interstate construction, interstate transfer, and minimum allocation funds for fiscal 1985 are also at stake.

Unlike last year, the release date of October 1 can be faithfully observed. This legislation approves a cost estimate for 18 months so the fiscal 1985 funds can be released on a timely basis—October 1, 1984. Any further disruptions to the program will be very damaging.

Previous to passage of H.R. 4957, which succeeded in releasing half the ICE and ISCE funds last month, about 34 States had totally run out of interstate construction money. As my fellow Senators know, in order for the Federal-aid highway program to be effective, States must be assured of stable, long-term funding; it is only in this way that they can do the necessary planning over the several years it takes to initiate and finally complete a major transportation project.

Federal Highway Administrator Ray A. Barnhart recently observed:

> Without prompt congressional action to release the remaining interstate funds, many other essential highway improvement projects throughout the Nation may not be started this year, thus exacerbating deteriorating road conditions in many areas of the country.

In order to prevent the kind of disruption the program has just had, this legislation contains a provision which directs the Secretary to apportion interstate construction and substitute funds on October 1 of each year after making specific administrative adjustments. Approval by Congress would no longer be required for the release of these funds. Cost estimates would continue to be submitted to Congress and the Congress would not be precluded from acting at any time to make changes to the estimates.

In attempting to approve cost estimates last summer, we faced a situation where the ICE and ISCE approvals were held hostage for other items. There has been a major increase in highway user fees which has resulted in a major increase in the Federal-aid highway program. However, even though there has been such an increase, Federal funds will not be able to address all the States' and localities' highway and bridge needs. This program has been a successful Federal program and it has worked well in the past because the States and localities have been responsible for making decisions about the priority of specific projects. I believe we must continue the program on this basis and keep specific project authorizations to a minimum. I would hope that the desire for other items will not put in jeopardy the timely release of these funds.●

By Mr. HEFLIN (for himself and Mr. DENTON):

S. 2528. A bill to relieve Alabama Christian College of the liability to pay certain sums owed to the United States; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

RELIEF OF ALABAMA CHRISTIAN COLLEGE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, today, I am joined by my colleague and friend, Senator JEREMIAH DENTON, in introducing a bill on behalf of Alabama Christian College in Montgomery, Ala. The purpose of the bill is to relieve Alabama Christian College of the liability to reimburse certain sums owed to the U.S. Government which occurred through no fault of the school.

During academic years 1981–82 and 1982–83, several student aid grants were awarded to Alabama Christian College's junior and senior year students under title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965. Alabama Christian College was fully accredited as a junior college on December 1, 1971, by the Southern Association of Colleges and Schools. This accreditation was reaffirmed for a 10-year period in 1975.

In 1978, the board of trustees of Alabama Christian College submitted an application to the Southern Association of Schools and Colleges for senior college status. Last year, Alabama Christian College was granted a candidate status as a senior college by the Southern Association of Schools and Colleges.

However, during the transition period from junior to senior college status, certain U.S. Department of Education forms required by the Higher Education Act of 1965, as amended, were not received by the Secretary of the Department of Education. The forms in question were those required by title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965 pertaining to the eligibility of a school to participate in the student assistance programs such as the Pell grant, the secondary education opportunity grants, and the guaranteed student loan program.

Officials of Alabama Christian College assumed compliance on their part and awarded the Federal aid to their students, but were subsequently told by the Department of Education that they were ineligible to receive such aid for the junior class of 1981–82 and the junior and senior class for the first semester of 1982–83. Alabama Christian College was placed in a position of moving from junior to senior college level and was in dire need of eligibility to participate in Federal student assistance programs and the Department of Education was unable to provide eligibility until this school was elevated from a junior college status to a full 4-year college and so recognized by the Southern Association of Schools and Colleges. This change in status left junior and senior students ineligible to receive the Federal aid which the college had already awarded them, assuming that they were authorized to do so inasmuch as the funds had been requested and drawn from the school's Federal cash account.

I want to emphasize, Mr. President, that these students were not determined to be ineligible until after they had completed the courses and the money had been extended. When the Department of Education determined that the college did not have the senior college level eligibility, officials of the Department were compelled to hold the college liable for $147,681.39 in Pell grants and college work study funds; $7,822.50 in national direct student loans; and $6,780.78 in federally insured student loans—FISL.

I wish to commend Secretary Bell and his fine staff at the Department of Education for the excellent cooperation and assistance to Alabama Christian College. Officials of the Department of Education did, in fact, extend eligibility as far as allowable by the Federal statutes for Alabama Christian College to participate in the Federal financial assistance programs, but were unable to provide wide discretion or latitude in establishing institutional eligibility retroactively for the academic years 1981–82 and 1982–83.

The school has now been granted 4 year college candidate's status and has been cleared by the Department of Education to participate in the student financial assistance programs. This, and the fact that Alabama Christian College now has a title III 4-year grant awarded by the Department of Education to strengthen administrative functions on the campus, is evidence that the school deserves relief from this "catch-22" liability.

Under the leadership of Dr. Jimmy Faulkner who serves as chairman of the board of trustees, and Dr. Ernest Clevenger, president of Alabama Christian College, the school has made enormous progress and has rendered an outstanding contribution to higher education in Alabama. As a private institution, Alabama Christian College has had to raise funds every year, above and beyond what tuition and fees generated in order to build its excellent and commendable record. The school is dedicated to the highest standards of academic excellence and has a minority student enrollment of 52 percent. In fact, Alabama Christian College accepted minority students long before the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Higher Education Act of 1965. The programs and admissions policies of Alabama Christian College have long been recognized as exemplary and the school has received commendations from the Honorable George C. Wallace, Governor of the State of Alabama, from the State news media, from officials of the Department of Education, and from me.

The college is doing on its own what the Congress has legislated that institutions of higher learning should do to assist disadvantaged, minority, and neglected students. Many of these disadvantaged students simply would not have the opportunity to pursue their life's goals without the fine educational programs offered them by Alabama Christian College. Certainly, this institution is to be commended and assisted in every way for the outstanding work it has done. Therefore, I am asking that Alabama Christian College be relieved of the imposed liability to repay the U.S. Government for funds which were inadvertently provided for its junior and senior year students for the academic years 1981–82 and 1982–83. The legislation I am introducing today is the only avenue of relief for this outstanding Christian college. It is my sincere hope that the Senate will act quickly on this measure and that the U.S. Congress will enact it into law.

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, it is a pleasure to join with my distinguished colleague from Alabama in introducing legislation to forgive Alabama Christian College from repayment of sums that it in good faith awarded to juniors and seniors through the three major student-aid programs.

Alabama Christian College was founded in 1942. It was accredited as a junior college in 1971. In 1981, the college moved to become a senior college by accepting its first junior class. It graduated its first senior class in May 1983.

A misunderstanding arose when the Department of Education did not receive notice of the establishment of the 4-year baccalaureate program at Alabama Christian College. In the meantime, however, the college had awarded Pell grant, national direct student loans, and federally insured loans to juniors and seniors who entered the 4-year program. Because of the lack of notification, the Department ruled that it had no authority to determine retroactively the school's eligibility for those programs.

Alabama Christian College is being held liable for $162,284.67, despite the fact that it is now a fully accredited 4-year institution. I hope that the Senate will act quickly on the bill to avoid the injustice that will ensue if that fine institution is forced to repay a large amount because of an administrative misunderstanding.

By Mr. COCHRAN (for himself and Mr. PRYOR):

S.J. Res. 270. A joint resolution designating the week of July 1 through July 8, 1984, as "National Duck Stamp Week" and 1984 as the "Golden Anniversary Year of the Duck Stamp"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL DUCK STAMP WEEK

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing a joint resolution to designate 1984 as the "Golden Anniversary Year of the Duck Stamp," and to also designate July 1 through July 8, 1984 as "National Duck Stamp Week."

Fifty years ago, Congress passed the Migratory Bird Hunting Stamp Act. This act required everyone age 16 or older who hunts ducks, geese, or swans to carry a current, signed duck stamp. Since that time, more than 89 million duck stamps have been sold, providing $285 million for the purchase of 3.5 million acres of wetlands and other wildlife habitats. These millions of acres are now part of 186 national wildlife refuges.

Currently, 91 percent of the duck stamps sold each year are purchased by waterfowl hunters. However, millions of other people, especially conservation-minded individuals and organizations, have helped promote the only nationwide conservation stamp.

The tremendous task of preservation has really just begun. Nearly 500,000 acres of precious wetlands are disappearing annually. All Americans should be concerned about the future of our environment and this resolution can help bring to mind the need to protect and enlarge migratory bird refuges and waterfowl production areas.

With this resolution, let us continue to show our support for this conservation effort by designating 1984 as the "Golden Anniversary Year of the Duck Stamp," and the week of July 1 through July 8, 1984 as "National Duck Stamp Week." This certainly is a wonderful opportunity to make all citizens aware of their ability to aid in the preservation of waterfowl habitats and to insure these habitats a safe future.●

LEAHY (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2882

Mr. LEAHY (for himself, Mr. DODD and Mr. PELL) proposed an amendment to amendment No. 2881 proposed by Mr. SPECTER to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492) supra; as follows:

On line 2 of the amendment proposed by Mr. SPECTER, strike out "Not more than 70 percent" and insert "None."

KENNEDY AMENDMENT NO. 2883

Mr. KENNEDY proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492), supra; as follows:

At the appropriate place in H.J. Res. 492, add the following:

"Within 120 days of the enactment of this legislation, The President shall transmit to Congress a classified and unclassified version of a report on the whereabouts of military equipment transferred since 1980 from the United States to the Government of El Salvador, and the whereabouts of Salvadoran military personnel trained with U.S. military aid funds."

MOYNIHAN (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2884

Mr. MOYNIHAN (for himself, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. SPECTER, and Mr. DANFORTH) proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492) supra; as follows:

On page 4, insert between lines 18 and 19 the following:

"Notwithstanding section 660 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, for an additional amount for necessary expenses for assistance to the Government of El Salvador to protect jurors and other key participants in the criminal proceedings against those charged with the murders of four American churchwomen, during and subsequent to such proceedings, $500,000."

WILSON AMENDMENT NO. 2885

Mr. WILSON proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492), supra; as follows:

Insert at the appropriate place:

On Sunday, March 25, 1984, a remarkable exercise in democracy in the conduct of a free and honest election within the Republic the El Salvador took place, with approximately 70 percent participation by eligible voters despite intense guerrilla efforts to intimidate and to sabotage the election.

Since the success of the Government of El Salvador in the conduct of this election against the guerrilla efforts to disrupt and invalidate it depended both upon the courage, good spirits and determination of the Salvadoran people to freely choose their President and Vice-President, and upon the ability of the Salvadoran armed forces to safeguard voters and election officials against the guerrillas; and

Since within 30 days of certification of the results of the March 25 election a run-off election is required under the Salvadoran Constitution and election law, since no candidate won a majority of the vote at the March 25 election; and

Since the armed forces of El Salvador, unless immediately resupplied by the U.S. with equipment, arms and ammunition which are in critically short supply, are threatened with being unable to provide the same needed protection for the run-off election, and with suffering generally a dangerously reduced capacity to safeguard the Salvadoran people against the terrorism of the guerrillas;

Therefore, the Senate finds that the policy of the United States should be to immediately provide such additional equipment, arms, and ammunition as will allow the armed forces of El Salvador to provide needed protection to the Salvadoran people both at the run-off election and in their daily lives; and ultimately to so suppress guerrilla terrorism as to make possible the revival of economic activity with El Salvador.

BUMPERS (AND OTHERS) AMENDMENT NO. 2886

Mr. BUMPERS (for himself, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SASSER, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. EXON, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. DIXON, Mr. BIDEN, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. INOUYE) proposed an amendment to the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 492) supra; as follows:

At the appropriate place in the bill, add the following new section:

"SEC. —. If at any time following the appropriation of funds herein the duly elected President of El Salvador should be prevented from taking office by military force or military decree or after taking office should be deposed by military force or military decree, all funds appropriated herein for El Salvador and not theretofore obligated or expended shall not thereafter be available for obligation or expenditure unless appropriated again by Congress."

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE TRAGEDY OF MISSING CHILDREN

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, missing children represent a growing national tragedy. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services has estimated that each year approximately 1.8 million children are missing from their homes for varying periods of time. Approximately 90 percent run away for a few days and return home, but at least 100,000 children are abducted by one of their parents, and as many as 50,000 young Americans are reported as having been abducted by strangers. However, apparently one American city is proving that the annual disappearance of thousands of its children can have a happy ending. I submit for the RECORD an article by Gary Turbak from the April 1984 edition of Reader's Digest demonstrating how the city of Indianapolis, Ind., is locating its missing children.

The article follows:

THE CITY THAT FINDS ITS MISSING CHILDREN

(By Gary Turbak)

At age 15, Mary ran away from her home in a western city. While hitchhiking in California, she was raped. Then her forearms were chopped off and she was left along a country road to die. Mary survived, and now she warns other youngsters not to run away.

Mary's heartbreaking experience is an all-too-familiar American tragedy. Every year in the United States, some 1.5 million children run away. About 85 percent of them are eventually found or else return on their own, but tens of thousands fall into the hands of pimps and pornographers, become hooked on drugs and resort to stealing to survive on the streets, or are murdered. At least 150,000 children a year are abducted, by either strangers or non-custodial parents. The majority of them are never found.

What makes the situation even more tragic is that so little is being done on a national basis to find these lost children. One city that is setting a shining example is Indianapolis, America's 12th-largest metropolis (pop. 700,807). In 1982, for instance, the missing-persons unit of the Indianapolis Police Department (IPD) took reports on 1,592 missing youngsters. Every single one of those children has since been accounted for, most within a few weeks of their disappearance.

Last summer, I accompanied two IPD officers as they cruised the city's south side. Suddenly, a call came over the police radio: a three-year-old girl wearing green shorts had been reported missing from her home two blocks away. The officers turned the corner and there she was, green shorts and all, with four older children.

Detective Larry Summers called in: "Cancel that missing three-year-old. She's on her way home."

"That must be the quickest return on record," I said.

"We told you we work fast," said Summers, smiling.

Obviously, not all children are found so easily. In October 1981 more than 30 officers searched four days before one 19-month-old child was found in an abandoned house. Police looked for two weeks last summer before a 13-year-old runaway finally turned up at a local high school. "We'll spend as much time as necessary to find these kids," says Sgt. Joe St. John, 48, head of the IPD's missing-persons unit.

In 1983 nearly ten percent (149) of the IPD's missing-child reports involved children under age 11. Ninety percent of these were false alarms—youngsters who had gone to visit friends or who were simply late coming home. That left 15 very young children who were truly missing. They were all found. The older missing juveniles, 1627 of them, were mostly runaways. By year's end, only 43 of those cases were still open. St. John expected to find them, too.

What is responsible for this excellent record? First and foremost is the high priority given to missing youngsters. "There is no waiting period to report a missing child in Indianapolis," says St. John. "We take reports 24 hours a day, and missing-persons detectives are on call around the clock. Each case is assigned, often within 20 minutes, to one of the five full-time detectives whose primary job is to locate the missing."

Many other police departments insist on a 24-hour wait before even taking a report on a missing child, particulary an older one who might be a runaway. Others say they will do everything they can to locate a youngster, but their efforts are often ineffective because of inexperience or a lack of resources.

In Indianapolis, things are different. St. John urges parents to report runaways as soon as they are missed. Experience has shown that the sooner children are reported missing, the easier they are to find. Most runaways stay with someone they know for a while. If the search is delayed, the child may find new friends and become harder to locate.

The IPD's missing-persons unit was created in 1968. When St. John, a tough, street-savvy cop, took over the unit in 1978, he found policies and procedures poorly defined. For example, missing children received little publicity, and some parents calling to report a runaway child were told to call back the next day.

St. John's philosophy is to do a job the best way as quickly as possible. To illustrate why he feels such urgency about missing kids, he tells the following story:

One Sunday in June 1981, a 16-year-old retarded girl, who had been despondent over her lack of friends, was reported missing by her mother. St. John questioned her classmates and learned that she had begun to hang out around Willard Park on the city's tough east side.

On Monday, St. John spent hours there, showing people the girl's picture. No one had seen her. Then, about 5 p.m., he spotted her talking to two men in a truck near the park.

St. John had found the missing girl, but she was not a pretty sight. She was dirty and disheveled and appeared to have been using drugs. Her thighs and stomach were worn raw from repeated sexual activity. In her desire to make friends, she had fallen prey to pimps.

When the girl and her family were tearfully reunited, St. John told her mother, "You're lucky. Sometimes when pimps have no more use for a girl, they kill her."

St. John never really goes off duty. Headquarters has orders to wake him whenever a youngster cannot be found at night. That's another secret to Indianapolis's success: the willingness of so many to go beyond what is asked of them. The IPD officers' caring attitude does not end once they locate a runaway. They try to find out why each child took off. "In some cases, sending the runaway home may be a bad thing to do," says St. John.

Officers work closely with child-abuse officials to determine whether a returned runaway needs to be removed from the home. Such a youngster may go to Stopover, a crisis service offering temporary housing and intense counseling for youngsters and their families. Other runaways are placed temporarily in the Marion County Children's Guardian Home, a facility for dependent, neglected and abused kids.

The IPD's concern for missing children reflects a community-wide attitude. "When a child is missing, people are quick to offer help," St. John reports. In April 1983, for example, six-year-old Maria failed to appear for dinner. When a neighbor heard the news, he walked to the child's house. "We've never met," he said, "but I'd like to help."

At one time, about 20 neighbors were looking for Maria. Just after dawn, the girl walked home. Afraid of being scolded for coming in late, she had spent the night hiding. "Those people who had been helping could have been angry," says Maria's mother. "But the only thing that mattered to them was that Maria was safe. I never realized how much of a community we had until this happened."

The news media play an important role in the Indianapolis success story, too. Television airs photos of missing children. Newspapers publish their pictures, and descriptions go out on the radio. At least one life may have been saved because of media publicity. Last July, a 14-year-old mother ran away with her three-month-old son, who suffered from a potentially fatal illness and needed daily injections. The IPD arranged for the girl's picture to be shown on TV. Soon she appeared with her baby at a local hospital. She had apparently seen the TV message and realized how serious her son's illness was.

Another reason for IPD success is its monthly bulletin with photos of missing youngsters. The IPD prints 500 copies for distribution to officers on the street and police departments in nearby communities. Bulletins are posted in arcades, fast-food restaurants and other places where runaways might go.

"It costs us about $60 a month, and we feel we're getting excellent results," says Capt. Lawrence Turner, until recently head of the IPD's Juvenile Branch. "About 70 percent of the missing youngsters pictured are located before the next bulletin is published."

Another valuable (but underutilized nationally) tool is the FBI's National Crime Information Center (NCIC) computer. Since President Reagan signed the Missing Children Act in October 1982, parents have had the right to ask the FBI to enter information about missing children into this computer system, if the police have not already done so. Then it's available to law-enforcement agencies all over the country.

In August 1983, two girls, ages 12 and 14, and a 16-year old boy were reported as runaways from Indianapolis. Suspecting they had left the city together, St. John entered their names and descriptions into the NCIC computer.

A few days later police spotted three youths hitchhiking in London, Ky., and took them in for questioning. Their names were fed into the NCIC computer. The three were identified as the runaways from Indianapolis and were returned home safely.

The IPD unit had fostered cooperative efforts in surrounding Marion County. In September 1982 Captain Turner instituted the InterAgency Missing Juveniles Program, linking the IPD, the Marion County Sheriff's Department, the Indiana State Police and local police departments in nearby Lawrence, Speedway and Beech Grove. "Before this program," explains St. John, "one jurisdiction might not have given high priority to a missing youngster from another jurisdiction. Now they do."

"Our children are our future, the most precious commodity we have," sums up Captain Turner. "We're proud of our record in Indianapolis, proud that we find our missing kids. But I believe that any city where people care and work together can do the same."

HOW TO PROTECT YOUR CHILD

Experts say it is far easier to prevent a child from being taken than to find missing youngsters. Their advice to parents:

1. Teach your child your phone number, including area code, and your full address.
2. Keep up-to-date photographs of your child on hand.
3. Make a mental note of what your child is wearing every day.
4. Be sure your child knows what to do should you become separated from him or her.
5. Obtain dental records of your child as early as possible; keep them up-to-date.
6. Have a set of your child's fingerprints taken by the police or other professionals and keep it at home.
7. Make sure your school will phone you if your child is absent.

BANKRUPTCY JUDGES

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I ask that correspondence of Judge Barney E. Eaton III for the southern district of Mississippi and Judge David W. Houston III for the northern district of Mississippi to President Ronald Reagan in compliance with title 5, United States Code, section 8331(22)(a) be printed in the RECORD.

The letters follow:

U.S. BANKRUPTCY COURT,
SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI,
Jackson, Miss., December 6, 1983.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: While the law of bankruptcy is unsettled due to the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Northern Pipeline Construction Co. v. Marathon Pipe Line Co., 102 S.Ct. 2858, and Congressional inaction to remedy the problem in the Court's status, please accept this letter as my desire and intention of serving a 14-year appointment should that be the resulting law governing appointments.

I have been a Bankruptcy Judge since November 1, 1968, and have a great respect and affection for the importance of the position.

Respectfully submitted,

BARNEY E. EATON III.

U.S. BANKRUPTCY COURT,
NORTHERN DISTRICT OF MISSISSIPPI,
Aberdeen, Miss., December 14, 1983.

The PRESIDENT
The White House
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In conformity with Title 5, United States Code, Section 8331(22)(A), I wish to advise that I agree to accept appointment as a Judge of a United States Bankruptcy Court established under Section 201 of the Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978 (PL 95-598, Nov. 6, 1978, 92 Stat. 2681).

While I am aware of the fact that the future of the bankruptcy courts is in doubt because of the failure of Congress to approve legislation to meet the constitutional problems presented in Northern Pipeline Construction Company v. Marathon Pipeline Company, 102 S. Ct. 2858 (1982), this notice is being given to protect the retirement benefits contained in 5 USC Sec. 8339(n). This letter is also written pursuant to the recommendation of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts.

Very truly yours,

DAVID W. HOUSTON III,
U.S. Bankruptcy Judge,
Northern District of Mississippi.●

UNDERWRITERS LABORATORIES, INC., CELEBRATES 90TH ANNIVERSARY

● Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the fact that a very well-known organization in my State is celebrating its 90th anniversary this year.

Underwriters Laboratories, Inc., of Northbrook was founded in Chicago in 1894 on a budget of $350. It has grown today into a worldwide network of laboratories and offices. But the UL of today really differs only in the size of its operations. The primary concern of its nearly 3,000 member staff is still the public's safety.

The true worth of UL to society cannot be measured in dollars and cents. It must be measured in terms of lives that were not lost, in injuries that did not occur, in property that was not damaged or destroyed—in short, in accidents that did not happen. As the company embarks on its second 90 years, the State of Illinois wishes them continued success as they continue to prevent accidents from happening.●

THE EFFECTS OF EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENTS IN STATE CONSTITUTIONS

● Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, one of the highly controversial aspects of the proposed equal rights amendment is its potential effect upon State constitutions. An excellent statement on that subject was written by my good friend Phyllis Schlafly. Mrs. Schlafly is recognized national authority on the equal rights amendment. I ask that her statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

[Preprint From Policy Review]

THE EFFECT OF EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENTS IN STATE CONSTITUTIONS

(By Phyllis Schlafly)

In the span of years during which the proposed Equal Rights Amendment [1] to the United States Constitution has received active consideration by the Congress and the various state legislatures, that is, during the decade of the 1970s, several states have amended their state constitutions by provisions which have become popularly known as State Equal Rights Amendments (ERAs).[2] Since these State ERAs are sometimes believed to be state enforcement of what the Federal ERA, if ever ratified, would require on a nationwide basis, and are believed, therefore, to forecast the eventual effect of a Federal ERA, it is important to analyze their language and the effect they have had in the various states that have enacted them.

The term "Equal Rights Amendment" refers to the proposed federal and state constitutional amendments which mandate equality on account of sex. It does not refer to any other type of equality. It has no reference to equality on account of race, color, creed, age, income level, or any other characteristic.

Since it is self-evident that legislatures have the power to pass sex-equal laws and to repeal sex-discriminatory laws independent of any ERA, this discussion will be generally limited to an analysis of the amendments themselves and of the changes in state laws which have been compelled by the State ERAs through court decisions. Also, in order to be accurately attributable to a State ERA, such changes must be beyond those which would have been required had the case been brought under the already-existing Equal Protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which has been used repeatedly by the U.S. Supreme Court and other courts to invalidate many sex-discriminatory federal and state laws.[3]

At the outset, several fundamental differences between the State ERAs and the proposed Federal ERA should be noted.

(a) No State ERA governs federal law. Therefore, many of the principal effects anticipated under the proposed Federal ERA would never result from any State ERA (for instance, the application of the full-equality principle to the military, including conscription and combat assignment). The House Judiciary Committee stated in its majority report on the Federal ERA, "For example, not only would women, including mothers, be subject to the draft but the military would be compelled to place them in combat units alongside of men." [4]

(b) State constitutions are interpreted principally by state courts. The proposed Federal ERA would, if ratified, be interpreted principally by the federal courts, which include some of the most activist courts in the country. While state courts would be bound to follow the U.S. Supreme Court interpretation of the Federal ERA, federal courts would not be bound to interpret the Federal ERA to produce the same result as any state court's interpretation of its State ERA. The proposed Federal ERA would give the federal courts a blank check to fill in after ratification. Thus, as Professor Paul Freund stated, "If anything about this proposed amendment is clear, it is that it would transform every provision of law concerning women into a constitutional issue to be ultimately resolved by the Supreme Court of the United States." [5]

(c) The legislative histories of the Federal and the State ERAs are different. The proposed Federal ERA has an extensive and well-recorded legislative history, including lengthy congressional debate in both houses and many roll-call votes on proposed modifications in language which establish a clear pattern of legislative intent for the guidance of the courts. In the U.S. Senate, Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., offered nine amendments variously exempting from the absolute-equality mandate compulsory military service; combat duty; the traditional rights of wives, mothers, widows and working women; privacy; punishment for sexual crimes; and distinctions made on physiological or functional differences. All amendments were defeated on roll-call votes, forcing the legal conclusion that the Federal ERA is designed to accomplish precisely what Senator Ervin and his supporters sought to exempt.[6] In contrast, the legislative history of State ERAs is sparse or non-existent. Most state legislatures do not print committee reports. Many state legislatures do not keep a journal which records debates. Many state legislatures enacted State ERAs (as well as ratifications of the Federal ERA) with little or no debate. There is no significant evidence to prove that the legislative intent of the State ERAs requires an absolute standard of interpretation.

THE TEXTUAL DIFFERENCES

Articles and discussions of State ERAs use many different figures for the total number of states which have allegedly enacted an Equal Rights Amendment into their constitutions. The number is uncertain because of the variety in the language of the State ERAs. Constitutional provisions with different language will obviously produce differents results.

In order to examine the hypothesis that the effect of State ERAs can be extrapolated into a valid prediction of what the proposed Federal ERA, if ever ratified, would accomplish, it is necessary first to compare the text of the proposed Federal ERA with those of the seventeen states which are sometimes alleged to have enacted a State ERA.

The proposed Federal Equal Rights Amendment, passed by Congress and sent to the states to start the ratification process on March 22, 1972, reads in full as follows:

Section 1. Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any state on account of sex.

Section 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

Section 3. This amendment shall take effect two years after the date of ratification.[7]

No state, of course, has put the full Federal ERA language into its state constitution. No State ERA has a "Section 2" giving Congress the power of enforcement or shifting any power from the states to the federal government.

A clause identical to Section 2 appears in seven other amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Many Supreme Court cases since 1965 have interpreted the identical enforcement clause in the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments in a way that accomplishes a transferral of power from the states to the Congress that is even broader than the Necessary and Proper Clause or the Commerce Clause. These decisions shifted from the states to the federal domain powers over elections,[8] private property,[9] and private schools.[10]

This same enforcement clause grants Congress not only the power to enforce Section 1, but also the power to define what Section 1 means and to preempt valid state laws in order to substitute its decision-making power for that of the states.[11] Supreme Court cases have also greatly expanded the definition of the scope of the state action that activates these constitutional amendments and their enforcement clauses and have held that the involvement of the state need not "be either exclusive or direct."[12]

Just as the identical enforcement clauses of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments have transferred from the states to the federal government the enforcement and preemption power over the subject-matter of Section 1 of those amendments, Section 2 of the Federal ERA would likewise transfer from the states of the federal government the enforcement and preemption power over the subject-matter of Section 1 of ERA, namely, all state laws that have traditionally made distinctions based on sex. This would include laws governing marriage, divorce, child custody, family property, inheritance, widow's privileges, homosexual activity, abortion, prison regulations, insurance rates, and private schools.

That the enforcement power over ERA will be in the hands of the federal government is further confirmed by its legislative history. In all earlier versions of the Federal ERA, from its first introduction into Congress in 1923 until 1971, Section 2 read: "Congress and the several states shall have power, within their respective jurisdictions, to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." When the version that was finally passed was introduced in 1971, the words emphasized above were deleted.

The reach of Section 2 of ERA is so extensive that Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., recognized as the dean of lawyers in the U.S. Senate until his recent retirement, told the Senate on March 22, 1972: If this Equal Rights Amendment is adopted by the states, it will come near to abolishing the states of this Union as viable governmental bodies. I think it will virtually reduce the states of this nation to meaningless zeros on the nation's map. I think it will transfer virtually all the legislative power of government from the states to Congress.[13]

The vast areas of legislation subject to Section 1 of ERA, because of traditional distinctions made between the sexes, make it certain that the shift of power from the states to the federal government under Section 2 of ERA would be even greater than under the enforcement clauses of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendments. Under the maxim cui bono, this effect is more than sufficient to explain the unprecedented efforts made by the executive branch of the federal government to induce state legislatures to ratify ERA.[14]

Even if all fifty states were to adopt a State ERA, their cumulative effect on our unique American federal structure and on our methods of fighting wars would be miniscule compared to the vast changes that would be compelled by the Federal ERA.

Putting aside the tremendous effect of Section 2 of the Federal ERA, we will now compare the various State ERAs with Section 1 of the Federal ERA in order to determine whether the State ERA experience offers any guidance as to what the proposed Federal ERA, if ever ratified, would accomplish. In this analysis, we should keep in mind the limited jurisdiction of the State ERAs and the fact that state court determinations about State ERAs would not be binding on federal court interpretations of the Federal ERA.

AMBIGUOUS TERMINOLOGY

It should also be pointed out that nowhere in the Federal or in any State ERA are the terms "equality of rights" or "sex" defined. The former is not a term of art for which there are legislative, judicial, or dictionary definitions. It is a nebulous phrase that can mean different things to different people, especially in situations in which different results would be obtained depending on which quality of the asserted right is being equalized. The phrase came into our constitutional lexicon without any judicial history to circumscribe its scope. "Sex" is a word with a half dozen different dictionary definitions which may be loosely divided into (a) the sex you are and (b) the sex you do. No ERA tells us which definitions of sex are covered. No ERA excludes any definitions of sex.

Comparing the texts reveals that some prohibit a denial of rights only by state action, but others have no such limitation, indicating a broad application to activities by private citizens. The phrase that makes this difference is usually "by the state." The words "under the law" do not necessarily determine the state-action limitation; it can be argued that we are all "under the law."

Despite the large number of states that are alleged to have State ERAs, the texts reveal a great difference in language, and experience reveals a great difference in effect.

The Colorado Constitution reads: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the state of Colorado or any of its political subdivisions on account of sex."[15]

The Hawaii Constitution reads: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the state on account of sex."[16]

The Maryland Constitution has the same language but does not limit the scope to state action: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be abridged or denied because of sex."[17]

Two state constitutions, which have language similar to the proposed Federal ERA, do not limit the scope of control to state action, but do limit the benefits to individuals. The Pennsylvania Constitution reads: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania because of the sex of the individual."[18] Note that the language says "in" Pennsylvania, not "by" Pennsylvania. The New Mexico Constitution reads: "Equality of rights under law shall not be denied on account of the sex of any person."[19]

No case has yet addressed the issue of what difference it may make to limit the benefits to individuals or to persons. It would appear to exclude corporations from having a cause of action. It should surely exclude non-human rights; it was suggested during the debate on the Federal ERA that it is broad enough to outlaw any distinction between, say, male and female dogs.

It could also be argued that the Pennsylvania and the New Mexico State ERAs would not cover collective rights. This could be an important field because the prohibition of discrimination on the basis of sex which appears in Title VII and Title IX of the Federal Civil Rights Act has been interpreted by the courts and by federal agencies in the employment and education fields, respectively, as permitting or requiring affirmative action on a group, or collective, basis.[20] Although the word "quota" is almost never used, the targets, goals, timetables, and profiles are expressed in statistical terms to measure members of an identifiable group. Since affirmative action programs accord rights to groups rather than to individuals, it could be argued that the Pennsylvania and New Mexico State ERAs would not permit affirmative action. The original sponsors of the Federal ERA certainly planned it to include affirmative action for women and so stated in congressional debate.[21]

The Washington State ERA adds the phrase "and responsibility": "Equality of rights and responsibility under the law shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex."[22] That extra word is explicit recognition of the fact that the sex-neuterization of legislation involves imposing responsibilities as well as granting rights. One person's right may be another's responsibility or duty.

The Alaska Constitution is one of several state constitutions that limit the application of ERA to civil and political rights: "No person is to be denied the enjoyment of any civil or political right because of race, color, creed, sex or national origin." [23] This language would include political rights such as voting and running for office and civil rights such as freedom of speech, press, religion, travel, education, the right to make contracts, to sue and to engage in a useful occupation. Arguably, this language might exclude the various rights which are not civil or political rights, such as preferential property rights and support and custody rights belonging to wives, insurance benefits, or fringe benefits in employment.

The Montana Constitution is similar: "Neither the state nor any person, firm, corporation, or institution shall discriminate against any person in the exercise of his civil or political rights on account of race, color, sex, culture, social origin or condition, or political or religious ideas." [24] This language is broad in that it extends to all kinds of private action as well as governmental action, but it is limited in scope to civil and political rights.

The Illinois Constitution has one of the so-called State ERAs that are not "equal rights" amendments at all because they do not use the undefined "equality of rights" language. The Illinois Constitution uses the familiar and judicially more precise language of the Fourteenth Amendment: "The equal protection of the laws shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex by the state or its units of local government and school districts." [25] "Equal protection of the laws," through a century of litigation, has not been held to mean that every person must be treated equally, but that persons similarly situated must be similarly treated, thereby allowing classifications for rational legislative purposes. The "equal protection" amendments, therefore, have a wholly different parentage from that of the "equal rights" amendments. It is a mistake to assert that a state has an ERA when it actually has an EPA (Equal Protection Amendment).

Connecticut also has an "equal protection" amendment instead of an "equal rights" amendment: "No person shall be denied the equal protection of the law nor be subjected to segregation or discrimination in the exercise or enjoyment of his or her civil or political rights because of religion, race, color, ancestry, national origin or sex." [26]

In another group of states, "sex" is simply included in a catchall anti-discrimination provision. While the language may appear to be as strict as that of the Federal ERA, the courts have not construed this type of State ERA as requiring an absolutist interpretation. Although this difference is nowhere explained in judicial opinions, it is reasonable to argue that the legislative history and adoption by the voters of a general provision barring discrimination against various minorities do not reveal sufficient identification of the "sex" issue to justify overturning traditional, rational differences of treatment between males and females.

The Texas Constitution states: "Equality under the law shall not be denied or abridged because of sex, race, color, creed, or national origin." [27]

The New Hampshire Constitution reads: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by this state on account of race, creed, color, sex or national origin." [28]

Massachusetts was the most recent state to insert a general anti-discrimination provision into its Constitution: "Equality under the law shall not be denied or abridged because of sex, race, color, creed, or national origin." [29]

The Virginia Constitution also uses general anti-discrimination language but adds an express qualifying clause that carves a clear exception to the otherwise broad mandate: ". . . the right to be free from any governmental discrimination upon the basis of religious conviction, race, color, sex, or national origin shall not be abridged, except that the mere separation of the sexes shall not be considered discrimination." [30] That clause should eliminate the restroom argument in connection with the Virginia ERA.

PITFALLS OF AN ABSOLUTE MANDATE

The Virginia State ERA proves that constitutional draftsmen know that a prohibition against all sex discrimination also bans sex-separation unless that is specifically excepted. Ever since Brown v. Board of Education [31] in 1954, it has been constitutionally clear that, in matters of race, separate-but-equal is not equal but discriminatory. The obvious implications of the unique language in the Virginia ERA probably explain why ERA proponents usually omit Virginia from the list of states having a State ERA. The Connecticut ERA forbids segregation because of sex, but that must be read in the context of the equal-protection language which permits rational classifications.

The Louisiana Constitution also proves that some states fully understand the pitfalls of an absolute mandate against all sex discrimination and want to guard against its rigidity. Its constitutional provision has a unique wording: "No law shall arbitrarily, capriciously, or unreasonably discriminate against a person because of birth, age, sex, culture, physical condition, or political ideas or affiliations." [32]

The Utah and Wyoming provisions are also usually omitted from lists of State ERAs on the pretext that they were enacted in the 1890s and, therefore, are not relevant to the current controversy. However, their language is just as modern.

The Utah Constitution reads: "The rights of citizens of the state of Utah to vote and hold office shall not be denied or abridged on account of sex. Both male and female citizens of this state shall enjoy equally all civil, political and religious rights and privileges." [33] The Utah ERA sounds as though it were written in the 1970s. Perhaps those who exclude Utah from the discussion would rather not call public attention to the fact that Utah—which has repeatedly refused to ratify the Federal ERA—gave women the right to vote a full generation before the Women's Suffrage Amendment was added to the U.S. Constitution.

The Wyoming Constitution reads: "Since equality in the enjoyment of natural and civil rights is only made sure through political equality, the laws of this state affecting the political rights and privileges of its citizens shall be without distinction of race, color, sex, or any circumstance or condition whatsoever other than individual incompetency, or unworthiness duly ascertained by a court of competent jurisdiction." [34]

Determining the intent of the legislatures and of the voters (in states which require referenda on state constitutional amendments) who approved State ERAs is made extremely difficult by the way the operative language was often surrounded by other language, especially in the constitutions of those states where sex was included in a general prohibition against discrimination on account of race, creed, color, or national origin. In the 1970s, there was almost no way such a proposal could fail. The debate on sex equality could hardly be separated from the rest of the clause, either in debate or in the minds of the legislators or citizens.

Furthermore, many states added other language which made identification of the sex-equality issues almost impossible. Thus, the ballot which confronted the Massachusetts voters on election day in November 1976 asked for a yes or no vote on a paragraph that looked like an excerpt from the Declaration of Independence: All people are born free and equal, and have certain natural, essential, and unalienable rights; among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; that of acquiring, possessing and protecting property; in fine, that of seeking and obtaining their safety and health. Equality under the law shall not be denied or abridged because of sex, race, color, creed, or national origin. [35]

After passage, the voters were told they had approved a State ERA, and litigation began to try to enforce it as an absolute standard.

Several states buried their State ERAs in a section that starts with non-controversial language already included in the U.S. Constitution. Montana preceded its ERA, in the same paragraph, with: "the dignity of the human being is inviolable. No person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws." [36] The New Mexico Constitution's ERA starts off like this: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor shall any person be denied equal protection of the laws." [37] The Louisiana ERA paragraph starts with: "No person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws. No law shall discriminate against a person because of race or religious ideas, beliefs, or affiliations." [38] Many states have Bills of Rights and Equal Protection language somewhere in their constitutions. The point here is that it is difficult to detect a legislative or a people's intent to impose an absolute-standard ERA when ERA was the last sentence in a paragraph of familiar, respected, redundant constitutional language.

When an ERA is put into any constitution, what becomes the law of the state is not merely an idea or a hope or a goal, but a specific set of words that must be obeyed. Those words either have definite meanings in the English language or, if the meaning are imprecise, they will be defined later by the courts.

The wide variations in the language of the various State ERAs, combined with the imprecision and lack of definition of the operative terms, mean that courts have a wide latitude to do as they please in interpreting the State ERAs and the State EPAs (Equal Protection Amendments). There is absolutely no assurance that the courts of one state will follow the interpretation of another or that the federal courts will follow any state court.

So far there has been relatively little litigation based upon State ERAs. There is no indication that the women's movement is instigating test cases to force a speedy judicial clarification of what it would mean to our society to have ERA interpreted on an absolute standard. Enough litigation has taken place, however, to see that a general pattern is emerging in the courts. (a) If possible, courts are avoiding the interpretation of their State ERA by deciding cases on some other basis. (b) In states that have authentic State ERAs (those which contain language closely paralleling Section 1 of the Federal ERA), courts are generally using a literal and inflexible interpretation, following the plain meaning rule. (c) The rest of the so-called State ERA states (whether they have an equal-protection provision or a civil-and-political-rights provision or a race-creed-color-sex provision) are following the standard of review traditional under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment; that is, a legislature is permitted to classify on a rational basis when the classification is related to a permissible legislative goal and does not violate a fundamental interest.

Of course, where the equal protection analysis is used, the alleged State ERA becomes a constitutional redundancy because all fifty states now enjoy the full protection of the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

Only six State ERAs have language sufficiently like Section 1 of the Federal ERA that they can reasonably be considered to offer guidance about the meaning and effect of the proposed Federal ERA: Colorado, Hawaii, Maryland, Pennsylvania, New Mexico, and Washington.

TALLY ON THE SCOPE OF THE STATE ERAS

Legislative purpose clouded because of enactment in the 19th century: Utah, Wyoming—2.

EFFECT ON FAMILY LAW

When proponents were presenting their case for passage of the Federal Equal Rights Amendment to Congress in 1971 and 1972, they used as their principal legal statement about its anticipated effects an article of some one hundred pages in the Yale Law Journal. The article was quite frank in proclaiming that the adoption of a Federal ERA "will give strength and purpose to efforts to bring about a far-reaching change which, for some, may prove painful."[39]

The chief victims of these "painful" effects of the "far-reaching change" will be wives and mothers. This is the inescapable conclusion to be drawn from the family law litigation in the states that have adopted authentic State ERAs.

In Washington, which has a State ERA, the court admonished wives to face up to what ERA means: It is to be remembered that while the 61st amendment to the Constitution of the State of Washington, approved November 7, 1972, is commonly referred to as the Equal Rights Amendment, it firmly requires equal responsibilities as well. This amendment is the touchstone of the developing case and statute law in the area of marriage dissolution.[40]

The holding in this case, Smith v. Smith, was that ERA requires equal responsibilities of parents for child support and that the ex-husband can get his support obligations reduced to meet the ERA standard.

Wives have traditionally had in this country a great variety of extensive rights based on their marital status, as a result of our public policy to respect the family as the basic unit of society, and as statutory and common-law balance to the biological fact that only women have babies. These rights, which vary from state to state, include the wife's right of financial support in an ongoing marriage, the right of separate maintenance and payment of attorney's fees during divorce litigation, the right to alimony after divorce, the right to a presumption of custody of her children, rights against her husband's alienation of his property during his life or by will, and a variety of special benefits accorded to widows.

Such benign discrimination is wholly in harmony with the Equal Protection Clause and was seldom challenged prior to the 1970s. The U.S. Supreme Court in Kahn v. Shevin[41] made clear the current constitutionality and relevancy of such preferential statutes designed for the benefit of wives and widows. The Court held that, consistent with the Equal Protection Clause, a legislature can make a rational classification of widows as a class of people who need a special benefit. The Court upheld Florida's property tax exemption for widows. The challenge to the Florida statute was strongly supported by pro-ERA lawyers.

The states that have State ERAs are blazing the trail of the "painful" effects of applying an absolute standard of equality to the marital and parental relationships. They provide a window into which we can look to see what "equality of rights" means when applied to the husband-wife relationship.

Maryland is a State ERA state. In Coleman v. Maryland,[42] the Court of Special Appeals held that the statute which makes it a crime for a husband to fail to support his wife is unconstitutional under the State ERA. The court said that this statute "establishes a distinction solely upon the basis of sex" and "such distinctions are now absolutely forbidden" by the State ERA.

The court discussed the social policy and the history of the law which made it the duty of the husband to support his wife, calling it "warp and woof of the prevailing ethos" of the nineteenth century. All that is changed now, according to the court; "that view has been subjected to a series of violent cultural shocks. The Equal Rights Amendment of 1972 more accurately reflects the ethos or zeitgeist of this time." The court held that the support statute "is no longer the public policy of this state."

Newspapers which had been strong supporters of ERA were made very uncomfortable by this decision, calling it "an unfortunate conflict" of sexual justice, but admitted that the court had "no alternative" under the State ERA. The newspapers accurately pointed out that, while imprisonment for nonsupport is seldom imposed, the threat of imprisonment is a most valuable and necessary tool "to impress upon husbands their financial responsibility."[43] It is almost the only tool available to reduce the welfare rolls because, in the absence of this law and the remedies available under it, a large group of women become the financial responsibility of the taxpayers.

Pennsylvania is a State ERA state and, because of the State ERA, wives have lost their common law and statutory right to have their necessaries paid for by their husbands.

This common law right has been a right of wives for centuries and is an essential ingredient of the concept of the right of the wife to be supported in her home. The Pennsylvania statute read as follows: In all cases where debts may be contracted for necessaries for the support and maintenance of the family of any married woman, it shall be lawful for the creditor in such case to institute suit against the husband and wife for the price of such necessaries, and after obtaining a judgment, have an execution against the husband alone.[44]

In Albert Einstein Medical Center v. Gold,[45] The issue was whether, under the law which obligated the husband to pay for his wife's necessaries, the State ERA would obligate the wife to pay for her husband's necessaries. The Gold court held the law unconstitutional under the State ERA but, instead of invalidating it, extended the husband's liability to the wife and required her to pay for her husband's medical and hospital expenses.

In Gold, the courts apparently could not resist this caveat to wives: The matter before us is yet another example of the impact of the Equal Rights Amendment upon the lives of all citizens of the Commonwealth and, once again, demonstrates that those who seek to expand the equal rights concept must be prepared to accept the burdens as well as the benefits of such expansion.

The court did not say what the "benefits" are, but Gold and the subsequent "necessaries" cases described below surely make clear some of the burdens.

Two years later in Albert Einstein Medical Center v. Nathans,[46] the court faced the same law in its traditional circumstances: the question of payment for a wife's necessaries. The "necessaries" involved in this case were medical and hospital services provided to the wife in an ongoing marriage which were conceded to be "necessary for her health, well-being and comfort." The court simply nullified the common law and statutory responsibility of a husband to pay for his wife's "necessaries," noting that these include not only medical care, but also food, clothing, and shelter.

The court waxed very righteous in applying the absolute standard under the State ERA. The court held that "all legal distinctions based on the male or female role in the marital relationship are rendered inoperative by the [State ERA] amendment" and that the common law concept obligating the husband to pay for his wife's necessaries is "repugnant to the Equal Rights Amendment." The court took judicial notice of what it called "medical and scientific advances which have increased both production and population . . . have made birth control a desirable social objective, and have been factors liberating her [a wife] from the common law requirements that tethered her to her husband and her husband's home."

* The only State ERA's that should be compared to Section 1 of the Federal ERA.

"PAINFUL" EFFECTS OF ERA

Thus, it is clear that whichever way a State ERA is interpreted by the courts—to extend liability to both sexes as in Gold or to nullify the husband's liability as in Nathans—the Pennsylvania wife suffers the "painful" effects of the "far-reaching change" forced upon her by the State ERA.

A year later in Nan Duskin, Inc. v. Parks,[47] the same court "confirm[ed]" the Nathans decision, again calling the law that a husband is liable for his wife's necessaries "repugnant" to the State ERA. The court further justified and affirmed the Nathans approach over the earlier Gold approach, saying, "where a rule of law is repugnant to the Constitution it is the duty of the court to strike it, not to add provisions to it that will make it conform to the constitutional provision. The latter function is legislative."

The Duskin court further explained that "reliance on the Support Law, 62 P.S. 1921, adds nothing to defendant's position [because the] duty to support based on family relationship depends on dependence and indigency." In other words, although the Support Law was not the principal issue in this case, the court clearly pointed the "developing" law in the direction of establishing indigency or dependency as the only basis for a wife's claim of financial support from her husband in a state with a State ERA. Under ERA, a wife will have no claim to the financial support of her husband just because she is a wife and mother.

The implications of these decisions for the social and economic integrity of the family unit are "far-reaching" indeed. In the ERA world, there will be no right of the homemaker to make her career in the home unless she can prove she is indigent or about to go on welfare.

In DiFlorido v. DiFlorido,[48] the Pennsylvania Supreme Court nullified the presumption of a husband's ownership of household goods used and possessed by both spouses and replaced it with a presumption upon divorce that such property is jointly owned. The ERA proponents claim that this case is a gain for wives. Actually it isn't necessarily any such thing. Divorce settlements have traditionally awarded the house and its effects to the wife. To any extent that DiFlorido may be beneficial, the same result could have been secured by statutory change or an equal protection suit.

In Henderson v. Henderson,[49] the Pennsylvania Supreme Court ruled that the statute which allowed payment of alimony pendente lite (support during litigation), counsel fees and expenses to wives is unconstitutional under the State ERA. Before the court could nul'ify or extend the old law, the legislature extended liability for such payment to wives. Thus, the State ERA has cost wives their exclusive right to receive alimony pendente lite, counsel fees and expenses, and wives have acquired the new "right" to have the court hold them liable to make similar payments to their husbands.

The court again lectured wives on their new marital relationship under the State ERA: The sex of citizens of this Commonwealth is no longer a permissible factor in the determination of their legal rights and legal responsibilities. The law will not impose different benefits or different burdens upon the members of a society based on the fact that they may be man or woman. . . . The right of support depends not upon the sex of the petitioner but rather upon need in view of the relative financial circumstances of the parties.

This decision puts the Pennsylvania Supreme Court's imprimatur on the notion that, under ERA, the only wives who can claim support from their husbands are indigent wives.

In Wiegand v. Wiegand,[50] the Pennsylvania Superior Court nullified the statutory rights of wives to divorce from bed and board (separate maintenance) and to receive alimony pendente lite and attorneys' fees, as unconstitutional under the State ERA. The subsequent reversal by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court resulted only because the ERA had been improperly raised sua sponte by the Superior Court rather than being raised by the parties.

In Conway v. Dana,[51] the Pennsylvania Supreme Court invalidated under the State ERA the statute that placed the primary duty of support for a minor child on the father. The court stated that this presumption is clearly a vestige of the past and incompatible with the present recognition of equality of the sexes. The law must not be reluctant to remain abreast with the development of society and should unhesitatingly discard former doctrines that embody concepts that have since been discredited.

Again, the court gave its views on how the marital relationship should be structured: "Support, as every other duty encompassed in the role of parenthood, is the equal responsibility of both mother and father." Note that the court did not say that the duties of parents are equal; the court said that "every" duty of parenthood is the "equal responsibility of both mother and father." One wonders how the court would equalize "every" duty of parenthood.

In any event, under Conway and the State ERA, wives have now lost their right to have their husbands provide the primary support for their minor children, and wives have acquired the new "right" to be equally liable for the financial support of their children.

In Commonwealth ex rel. Spriggs v. Carson,[52] the Pennsylvania Supreme Court put fathers and mothers on an equal footing in regard to child custody. The court called the "tender years" doctrine (under which mothers were presumed to be entitled to custody of their children of "tender years") "offensive to the concept of the equality of the sexes which we have embraced as a constitutional principle within this jurisdiction."

So, under the State ERA, mothers have lost the presumption that they should have custody of their children.

In Adoption of Walker,[53] the Pennsylvania Supreme Court extended to unwed fathers the requirement for consent to adoption of their illegitimate children. The court held that the State ERA invalidated Section 411 of the Adoption Act which provided: "In the case of an illegitimate child, the consent [to adoption] of the mother only shall be necessary." The court held that his distinction between unwed mothers and unwed fathers is "patently invalid" under the State ERA.

The result of this decision is that an unmarried girl or woman, who is pregnant and wants to place her baby with loving adoptive parents so she can start a new life, will not be able to complete adoption proceedings unless she first identifies the father and secures his consent to adoption. This could be a great injustice to an especially vulnerble woman, invade her right to privacy, or induce her to have an abortion rather than have to idenfity the father.

In Hopkins v. Blanco,[54] the Pennsylvania Supreme Court extended the right to recover damages for loss of consortium to wives as well as husbands. ERA proponents claim that this is a gain for women under a State ERA since, under common law, this right belonged to husbands only. But the proof that ERA is not necessary to extend the right of consortium to wives is the fact that courts in non-ERA states have come to the same decision under the Equal Protection Clause. Among the numerous non-ERA states that have extended the right of consortium to wives are Arkansas,[55] California,[56] Delaware,[57] Georgia,[58] Iowa,[59] Michigan,[60] Mississippi,[61] Missouri,[62] Nebraska,[63] New Jersey,[64] New York,[65] Ohio,[66] Oregon,[67] Rhode Island,[68] and South Dakota.[69]

Colorado is a State ERA state. The legislature was not satisfied with the failure of the court to impose an absolute standard in a felony nonsupport case[70] and so accomplished the task legislatively by neuterizing the statute. Whereas the Colorado statute formerly obligated "man" to support "wife," the new law now reads "person" must support "spouse," which is not the same thing at all. Now a wife shares equally in the obligation to support her family under the threat of criminal conviction of a class-five felony.[71]

The other State ERA states, New Mexico and Hawaii, have had almost no family law litigation in which the courts have interpreted the State ERA.

STATE FUNDING FOR ABORTIONS

One lawsuit in Hawaii, however, is worthy of mention. On January 19, 1978, the Hawaii Right to Life brought suit against the State of Hawaii to enjoin the state from funding elective abortions. Two abortion doctors moved to intervene, alleging that they have a legal right to reimbursement for the performance of elective abortions. They alleged in their petition that this right to reimbursement rests on Hawaii's State ERA: Applicants' first claim to reimbursement as a matter of right rests on the Hawaii Constitution's guarantees of due process and equal protection and Article I, Sec. 21 which provides that "equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the state on account of sex." Abortion is a medical procedure performance only for women; withdrawing funding for abortions while continuing to reimburse other medical procedures sought by both sexes or only by men would be tantamount to a denial of equal rights on account of sex.[72]

The judge denied the motion of the abortionists, but he did not address the ERA argument.

Interestingly, one of the attorneys for the intervenors was Judy Levin in the Reproductive Freedom Project of the American Civil Liberties Union in New York. This claim obviously reflects the argument which abortion lawyers will use in litigation under State and Federal ERAs. Abortion has already been legalized under Roe v. Wade.[73] The State or Federal ERA may give a constitutionally-based claim to government-funded abortions, which is not a right under our existing Constitution.[74]

The cases in which a State ERA was at issue make it clear that any benefit to the woman could have been gained just as easily under the Equal Protection Clause. Where the ERA made a unique constitutional difference, it always resulted in a loss to the woman, especially to the wife and mother. In nearly every case in which the State ERA changed prior law, women were needlessly deprived of longstanding legal rights.

* * * * *

Turning now to the purported ERA state constitutions which do not have authentic Federal ERA-type language, the cases reveal an entirely different pattern. Courts in those states simply do not employ the absolute standard used in Pennsylvania and Maryland. Where the court uses equal protection analysis, the results are not significant different from those that would be obtained under the Fourteenth Amendment. This has dismayed some proponents of the absolutist approach. Here is how one commentator revealed disappointment: Judicial reaction to the sex equality provision of the Texas ERA . . . generally has been disappointing. Some decisions seem to accord no greater significance to this constitutional amendment than might be accorded a relatively trivial legislative amendment to the Uniform Commercial Code.[75]

Thus, in Cooper v. Cooper,[76] the court held that the Texas ERA was not violated by an unequal division of community property and child support obligations favoring the wife upon divorce. In Friedman v. Friedman,[77] the court held that the obligation to support children does not require mathematically equal contributions from both parents and that the care provided by the mother should be considered as well as money.

Illinois, an Equal Protection rather than an ERA state, has had a similar experience. In Randolph v. Dean,[78] the court held that the presumption favoring a mother's custody of her children may be constitutionally considered as one factor among several.

The Virginia Supreme Court specifically held that the State ERA is "no broader than the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States." In Archer v. Mayes, the court said ". . . women are still regarded as the center of the home and family life and they are charged with certain responsibilities in the care of the home and children."[79]

The Louisiana Supreme Court uses the rational relationship test in interpreting its so-called State ERA. In State v. Barton,[80] the court held that a state criminal neglect statute applicable only against husbands is valid under the Louisiana Constitution.

In sum, therefore, the Equal Protection Clause is more than adequate to eliminate obsolete and unjust discriminations and more just, because it allows rational classifications based on the obvious physical differences and differing family responsibilities of women and men. In the states where the so-called State ERA is really just a variation of the Equal Protection Clause, wives have not lost their traditional rights.

In the six states which have an authentic State ERA, however, the courts are using an absolutist standard of review, and the result is indeed "painful" for wives and mothers. The authentic State ERAs provide guidance for what Section 1 of the Federal ERA would require on a nationwide basis. The result would indeed be "far-reaching" in its assault on the traditional family and "painful" in its deprivation of longstanding rights of wives and mothers.

EFFECT ON SAME-SEX MARRIAGE

Whether persons of the same sex have a right to be issued a marriage license is a question which has been considered several times in recent years under state statutes and under the Fourteenth Amendment. In Baker v. Nelson,[81] the Minnesota court held that the prohibition against same-sex marriage does not offend the Equal Protection Clause, because "there is no irrational or invidious discrimination." The court distinguished Loving v. Virginia[82] on the ground that "there is a clear distinction between a marital restriction based merely upon race and one based upon the fundamental difference in sex."

Singer v. Hara[83] is the only case on record in which the right of homosexuals to marry was asserted under a State ERA. The Washington state court held that a denial of a marriage license to persons of the same sex does not violate the State ERA. The court distinguished Loving v. Virginia on the ground that any race classification is simply per se impermissible.

In upholding the state's action in denying a marriage license to persons of the same sex, the court used four arguments:

(a) The court stated that it is "obvious" that a marriage is "the legal union of one man and one woman" and that conclusion is the clear implication of state statutes. But this begs the question. The question is not what the statutes mean, but whether the statutes are constitutional under the State ERA. The court ignored the fact that the whole thrust of ERA is to remove sex classifications. The customary technique for doing this—the method massively urged by ERA proponents in all legislative and judicial contexts—is to delete the so-called sexist words such as man and woman from the statutes, replacing them with sex-neutral words such as person, taxpayer, and spouse.

(b) The court relied on its belief about the intent of the people in approving the State ERA: "We do not believe that approval of the ERA by the people of this state reflects any intention upon their part to offer couples involved in same-sex relationships the protection of our marriage laws." The evidence which the court relied on for this conclusion is, to say the least, inconclusive. First, the court quoted the "Statement against" the State ERA contained in the official 1972 Voters' Pamphlet published by the Secretary of State: "HJR 61 would establish rules in our society which were not intended and which the citizenry simply could not support. Examples are numerous: . . . 3) Homosexual and lesbian marriages would be legalized . . ." The Secretary of State's Voters' Pamphlet did not deny this point. In order to refute the point about homosexual marriages, the court chose as its evidence an article from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer which quoted anonymous ERA proponents describing the opponents' arguments generally as "emotional, irresponsible fantasies, misleading, deceptive and incorrect. HJR 61 would have none of the affects [sic] listed above, they say." On the basis of such anonymous invective in a newspaper article, the court presumed to determine the voters' intent.

(c) The court held against the same-sex appellants because they "have failed to make a showing that they are somehow being treated differently by the state than they would be if they were females." But the truth of this statement depends on the pronoun "they." Although the case is called Singer v. Hara, the appellants were Singer and Barwick, two males. The court is correct that "they" (appellants Singer and Barwick, both males) were not treated differently from the way the state would have treated them if "they" had been two females applying for a marriage license. But if Singer alone had brought the case, the court could not have made the above statement because Singer, a male, in applying for a marriage license to marry Barwick, a male, was treated differently indeed from the way he would have been treated if he had been a female applying for a license to marry Barwick, a male. Likewise, if Barwick had brought the case. Did Singer lose because he brought the case with Barwick instead of alone?

(d) Finally, the court argued that "the refusal of the state to authorize same-sex marriage results from such impossibility of reproduction rather than from an invidious discrimination 'on account of sex.'" That is true, but this traditional view of marriage is anathema to the ERA absolutists who want to use ERA to eliminate all vestiges of what they call "sex role determination in the law." Furthermore, the state does not prohibit the marriage of heterosexuals who expect to remain childless.

Those opposed to the granting of marriage licenses to homosexuals can rejoice that the Washington state court upheld the traditional view of marriage against attack under a State ERA. But it is clear that the arguments used by the court are simply not compatible with the arguments used by courts to invalidate other statutes under State ERAs. The Singer decision is out of touch with the absolutism enforced by other courts when rights are asserted under a State ERA. It is easy to see how courts in other states could reject the reasoning of Singer and come to the opposite conclusion. And there is no reason to believe that the federal courts will feel in any way bound by the Singer court.

After the Pennsylvania State ERA was adopted, Governor Milton Shapp issued Executive Order 1975-5 committing the state to work against discrimination based on sexual preference. The Commonwealth Court dismissed a complaint against it on the grounds that the court not interfere with a policy decision made by the executive branch. On June 23, 1977, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court affirmed the lower court ruling that the Governor acted within his executive powers.[84]

The homosexual community has in recent years conducted a highly aggressive pursuit of its claims in congress, state legislatures, city councils, and the media. It is reasonable to believe that it would initiate expensive litigation to achieve all it seeks, in one grand coup, through a federal constitutional amendment that would prohibit any denial of rights "on account of sex." It should be recalled that no ERA puts "women" in the constitution; all ERAs put "sex" in the constitution.

In litigating under the Federal ERA, the homosexuals will not only have the plain meaning of the language in their favor, but also the legislative history. Senator Sam J. Ervin, Jr., proposed an Amendment to the Federal ERA, which stated: "Neither the United States nor any state shall make any legal distinction between the rights and responsibilities of male and female persons unless such distinction is based on physiological or functional differences between them." [85] This modifying clause that would have exempted same-sex marriages from the Federal ERA mandate was soundly defeated.

Before the effect of ERA on homosexual marriages became so publicly controversial, many ERA proponents were quite open in predicting that ERA would require that marriage licenses be issued to persosn of the same sex. For example, Rita Hauser, United States representative to the United Nations Human Rights Commission, stated in her address on ERA to the American Bar Association Annual Meeting in St. Louis in August 1970: "I also believe that the proposed Amendment, if adopted, would void the legal requirement or practice of the states' limiting marriage, which is a legal right, to partners of different sexes." [86] An article in the Yale Law Journal candidly stated the case for this effect of ERA: A statute or administrative policy which permits a man to marry a woman, subject to certain regulatory restrictions, but categorically denies him the right to marry another man clearly entrails a classification along sexual lines. . . . The stringent requirements of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment argue strongly for . . . granting marriage licenses to homosexual couples who satisfy reasonable and non-discriminatory qualifications.[87]

If the U.S. Supreme Court one day confronts the issue of the asserted right of homosexuals to receive marriage licenses under the Federal ERA, it may come to the conclusion projected by Professor Paul Freund when testifying before the Senate Judiciary Committee: "Indeed, if the law must be as undiscriminating concerning sex as it is toward race, it would follow that laws outlawing wedlock between members of the same sex would be as invalid as laws forbidding miscegenation." [88]

Even a leading pro-ERA lawyer and author of a textbook on sex discrimination, Barbara Babcock, admits, "The effect that the Equal Rights Amendment will have on discrimination against homosexuals is not yet clear." [89]

Not yet? When will it become clear? Not until the Supreme Court makes its determination. And that won't be unless and until a case is brought after the Federal ERA is ratified. But then it will be too late to protest if the people don't like the decision.

EFFECT ON MASSAGE PARLORS

Laspino v. Rizzo [90] opened up a whole new area of rights under a State ERA which was probably unanticipated by those who supported adding it to the state constitution. The court held that Philadelphia's ordinance prohibitng commercial heterosexual massage "is clearly, palpably and plainly unconstitutional on its face, and the plaintiff is entitled to summary judgment as a matter of law." The court's analysis in Laspino exactly contradicts the analysis employed by the Singer court, discussed above.

This case makes clear the difference between the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which the Philadelphia ordinance did not violate according to the court and the State ERA, which the ordinance did violate. The court held that "the test for compliance with the ERA should, in the very least, be more stringent than that imposed under the Equal Protection Clause." The court held that the massage parlor ordinance was "invalid as violative" of the State ERA, regardless of whether the "absolute standard" or the "compelling state interest standard" was used.

The ordinance treated men and women exactly alike. The court admitted that it was "facially neutral with respect to gender, since it applies with like discrimination to both males and females in declaring that heterosexual massage is illegal." The ordinance read: "No person employed or engaged in the business of a masseur or a masseuse shall treat a person of the opposite sex." Thus, neither males nor females were discriminated against. Male masseurs and female masseuses were treated equally. Males being massaged and females being massaged were treated equally.

The court tackled this gender neutrality head-on and asserted, "However mere equal application among the members of the class defined by legislation does not satisfy compelling state interest analysis," citing Loving v. Virginia.[91] The court went on to say: This utilization of gender as the exclusive basis for distinction is impermissible under the absolute constitutional standard despite the superficial neutrality and equality of opportunity (or the absence thereof) of the ordinance. Equal application does not change the fact that the ordinance varies the treatment to be afforded to two otherwise equally-situated persons only on the basis of what sex they may be.

It is not known whether the court was making a play on words with its expression "equality of opportunity." In any event, the result of the decision was surely to provide "equality of opportunity."

The city defended the massage-parlor ordinance on the ground that it was properly exercising its police power to prevent illicit sexual behavior. The court rejected this argument because the ordinance only prohibited situations "engendering possible heterosexual prostitution, and does not proscribe 'treatment' of males by males, or females by females, which can also provide the setting for 'illicit sexual behavior.'"

Every argument made by the court in Laspino could be used to require the city to issue marriage licenses to homosexuals. Senator Birch Bayh has argued that, under the Federal ERA, the denial of a marriage license to two males could be balanced with the denial of a marriage license to two females. But when Philadelphia argued that it was sex neutral to balance the city's refusal to allow a masseuse to massage a male patron with the city's refusal to allow a masseur to massage a female patron, the court said that that type of neutrality is unconstitutional under the state ERA. The court held it to be a sex classification, nevertheless, and a discrimination on account of sex, even though neither males nor females were discriminated against.

It should be remembered that the language of the Pennsylvania State ERA, like all ERAs, does not put "women" or "gender" into the constitution, but only puts "sex" into the constitution. Sex is a word of many different meanings and is not defined in any ERA. As held in Laspino, the "sex" in the State ERA includes the sex in a massage parlor.

EFFECT ON SCHOOLS

Two cases in State ERA states have established the new rule that girls must be permitted to compete with boys in all sports, even contact sports such as football.

In Commonwealth v. Pennsylvania Interscholastic Athletic Association,[92] the court held unconstitutional under the State ERA a bylaw of the Pennsylvania Interscholastic Athletic Association (PIAA) which prohibited girls from competing against boys in interscholastic competitions. Even though neither of the parties requested it, the court extended its decision to cover football and wrestling. "It is apparent," the court said, "that there can be no valid reason for excepting those two sports from our order in this case."

Granting summary judgment as a matter of law, the court held that the mandate of the State ERA is absolute and must apply to all school sports regardless of any rational arguments that might be presented in behalf of exceptions.

The PIAA had sought to justify its bylaw on the ground that it gave girls "greater opportunities for participation if they compete exclusively with members of their own sex." The PIAA never got its day in court to make its argument.

In Darrin v. Gould,[93] the Supreme Court of the State of Washington likewise held that it is sex discrimination under the State ERA to deny girls the right to play on the high school football team. The court cites the "broad, sweeping, mandatory language" of the State ERA that compelled this result.

The argument was made in this case that allowing girls to compete with boys in contact sports such as football will result in boys being allowed to compete on girls' teams, thereby disrupting the girls' athletic programs. The court simply dimissed this as "opinion evidence" or "conjectural evidence" which cannot support a public policy contrary to the State ERA mandate.

One judge concurred reluctantly, "exclusively upon the basis that the result is dictated by the broad and mandatory language" of the State ERA. He questioned whether the people fully contemplated the result, but said that whether the people understood what they did or not "in sweeping language they embedded the principle of the ERA in our constitution, and it is beyond the authority of this court to modify the people's will. So be it.

Title IX of the Federal Education Amendments of 1972 [94] bans discrimination on account of sex in schools and colleges, but makes a number of statutory and regulatory exceptions to the absolute mandate. One of these exemptions is for the contact sports: boxing, wrestling, football, basketball, ice hockey, and rugby. If the Federal ERA is placed in the U.S. Constitution, it will wipe out all statutory and regulatory exceptions under Marbury v. Madison: "a law repugnant to the Constitution is void." [95]

Vorchheimer v. School District of Philadelphia [96] raises an interesting question about the tactics of proponents of the absolute standard for enforcement of ERA. The School District of Philadelphia maintains two sex-segregated public high schools as part of an otherwise coeducational, public school system, one called Philadelphia High School for Girls and the other Central High School (for boys). The trial court found as Fact #27 that "The courses offered at Girls are similar and of equal quality to those offered at Central." Susan Vorchheimer brought suit to force the boys' school to admit her.

The fatal defect in her suit, however, was that she brought it under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and under the Equal Education Opportunities Act of 1974, neither of which requires the sex-integration of all schools. The court upheld Philadelphia's right to maintain two voluntary sex-segregated schools. The U.S. Supreme Court, dividing 4 to 4, let this decision stand.

The mystery is why Susan Vorchheimer's lawyer and her ERA friends, who now complain about the decision all over the country, did not invoke the Pennsylvania State ERA, under which, using the absolute standard, she certainly would have won. Perhaps Miss Vorchheimer's friends were not ready to let the country know that the Equal Rights Amendment will make all single-sex schools unconstitutional—and thereby bring their long tradition of academic excellence to a close in the name of "equal rights."

In contrast to the absolute standard used by Pennsylvania under its State ERA, the courts in the equal-protection states continue to hand down decisions that allow a rational difference of treatment based on sex. Thus, in Mercer v. North Forest Independent School District,[97] the Texas Court of Civil Appeals held that the two-tiered approach used by the U.S. Supreme Court in equal protection cases is the proper method by which to judge the Texas so-called ERA. A boy had challenged the constitutionality of public school regulations which restricted the hair length of boys but not girls. The court stated: "We cannot agree with the Supreme Court of Washington that the ERA admits of no exceptions to its prohibition of sex discrimination."

It is clear that the non-ERA states and the equal-protection states will be able to maintain diversity in education and common-sense differences of treatment based on sex. The authentic ERA, State or Federal, will use a constitutional whip to force all schools, classes and school activities, athletics and regulations into the gender-free mold.

EFFECT ON CRIMINAL LAW

The area of criminal law offers another example of how ERA is not needed to extend rights to women, but nullifies existing laws that extend benefits to women.

Well before the Pennsylvania ERA was adopted, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court had decided that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits unreasonable sex discrimination. In Commonwealth v. Daniel,[98] the court nullified more servere sentences for women than for men convicted of crimes. So, without a State ERA, the courts already could and did nullify laws based on an unreasonable discrimination.

In Commonwealth v. Butler,[99] applying the State ERA, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court nullified the prohibition against minimum sentences for women convicted of crimes. If the statute involved here had been an unfair or unreasonable discrimination against women, it is obvious that the court would have been compelled to come to the same conclusion as it did in Daniel. However, the statute involved in Butler was not a discrimination against but a benefit to women convicted of crimes. It prohibited the imposition of minimum sentences for women offenders and allowed judges to set sentences which were lighter than the statute otherwise required, ranging up to a maximum sentence within the statutorily-prescribed maximum period.

As a result of the State ERA, female offenders have now acquired the new "right" to be required to serve a minimum statutory sentence just like male criminals, regardless of extenuating circumstances of the case.

In Percival v. Philadelphia,[100] the exemption of married women from applicatio of writs of capias ad respondendum was nullified. In plain language, the exemption of married women from being thrown in jail to recover fines and penalties was declared unconstitutional under the Pennsylvania State ERA.

EFFECT ON INSURANCE

The insurance industry is built on a distribution of risk among groups in which the average cost of the benefits can be statistically and reliably predicted. Everybody in the group pays a certain small premium so that no one in the group will be financially ruined by unforeseen and unwanted circumstances such as an untimely death, a major automobile accident, or a fire that destroys a home. If the insurance company could look into the future and know which individuals would have automobile accidents, it would obviously sell insurance only to those who would never need it. It is because we cannot predict which individuals will have the accidents or will die early that insurance costs are based on statistical averages of identifiable groups.

Among the facts on which insurance is based are those which prove differences based on sex. Statistical tables used by insurance companies provide such massive and reliable evidence of differences between the sexes that it is unnecessary to recite it here.

Among these differences are the facts, to cite just two examples, that, on the average, young men under age 25 have many more automobile accidents than young women and that women live longer than men. These statistical facts result in differentials in the prices paid by insureds. Young women under age 25 pay a much lower automobile accident insurance premium than young men under age 25. One recent study made by the industry shows that, if the insurance companies were required to charge males and females the same rate, young men would pay 8 percent less but young women would have to pay 29 percent more.[101]

The longer life span of women means that women pay lower life insurance premiums than men because they pay into the system for more years before they die. On the other hand, a pension plan which is designed to start paying an annuity at age 65 must be cost/equalized in one of two ways: by charging women more during the pay-in years before age 65, or by paying them a smaller benefit during the pay-out years after age 65.

Since insurance is regulated by state law, thus involving sufficient state action to bring it under any State or Federal ERA, what will be the effect of ERA on the insurance industry? No ERA State has answered this question yet, but the U.S. Supreme Court gave the probable answer in Los Angeles Dept. of Water and Power v. Manhart.[102]

In Manhart, the issue was whether the city of Los Angeles could charge women more for payments into a pension plan because they live more years after retirement than male employees. The city justified the differential on the grounds that (a) it was needed to equalize the take-home benefits after retirement, and (b) the differential was based on a factor "other than sex" which was protected by the so-called Bennett Amendment.[103] The legislative history of the Bennett Amendment, including the explicit statements of one of the sponsors, Senator Hubert Humphrey, showing the congressional intent to allow sex differentials based on longstanding differences of treatment in retirement determined by valid sex differences, was set forth in the case.

Nevertheless, the Court held that the result was the classification of males and females by sex, and that is "sex discrimination" which is prohibited by Title VII of the Civil Rights Act.[104] Conceding that "retroactive liability could be devastating for a pension fund," the Court denied retroactive relief but invalidated the differentials in payments into the pension plan.

Manhart applies only to the limited area of pensions governed by Title VII. All pensions, however, could be held subject to the State or Federal ERA whenever the challenge is brought. The results cannot help but be hurtful to women and costly to everyone. Since it is self-evident that insurance companies will have to cover their costs under any formula, the "marriage" of Manhart to ERA threatens the pocketbooks of all those who buy insurance.

CONCLUSION

The experience of the seventeen states which allegedly have State ERAs provides conclusive proof that ERA is not needed to accomplish any reasonable objective or any objective at all that is beneficial to women. All reasonable and beneficial changes in existing law can be made by the passage or repeal of statutes by Congress or the state legislatures or by the courts' use of the authority of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In case after case, the federal and state courts, both in ERA and non-ERA states, have used the Equal Protection Clause to invalidate obsolete, unjust discriminations on account of sex or to extend the law to apply to both sexes.

The speed with which Congress reversed the effect of the U.S. Supreme Court decision in General Electric Co. v. Gilbert[105] proves how viable and effective this process is. The Court held that it was not sex discrimination for a company disability plan to exclude disability wages to pregnant female employees, and within two years Congress by statute nullified that decision.

The experience of the State ERAs also shows conclusively that ERA is of no unique value whatsoever to women in the economic sphere. The coverage of federal statutes and executive orders is much broader than that of any ERA, and the remedies, through federal agencies and courts, are much more extensive. Those who believe that ERA means "equal pay for equal work" or that ERA will result in higher pay, more promotions, and greater job opportunities for women are living in a dream world. The State ERA experience proves that ERA provides no gain for working women.

Dothard v. Rawlinson[106] indicates one possible exception to this conclusion. Dothard was the case of a woman who applied for a job as a guard in an Alabama maximum security prison. After being denied the job, she sued charging sex discrimination under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act. The Court held that the facially neutral height and weight requirements were sex discriminatory because they excluded 41 percent of the female population and only one percent of the male population. But the Court did not give her the job because of the exception in the Title VII for a Bona Fide Occupational Qualification (BFOQ). In order to apply the BFOQ exception, however, the Court felt it necessary to describe in detail what is called the "jungle" conditions in Alabama prisons.

If ERA were adopted into the U.S. Constitution or if Alabama had had a State ERA, the absolute language and the absolute standard of either would have made the exception for a BFOQ constitutionally invalid. So, under a Federal or State ERA, a small woman might be able to get a job as a prison guard in a maximum security prison that she could not otherwise get.

What are the gains for women under State ERAs? The right of high school girls to play on the boys' football team and the right of men and women to go to heterosexual massage parlors. For that, wives have lost such longstanding rights as the rights to be supported; to have their hospital bills paid for; to be provided with food, clothing, shelter, and other necessaries; to have their minor children supported; and to have the presumption of custody of their children. Wives in EPA states (Equal Protection states) have not lost any of those rights, nor have wives in non-ERA states.

The experience of the State ERAs is more than adequate to convince us that ERA is unnecessary to achieve any beneficial goal for women or society, unreasonable in its absolute refusal to recognize obvious differences between the sexes, and unwanted in its potential to upset traditional objections to homosexual marriages, massage parlors, government-funded abortions, and other imaginative uses of the term "sex." Since there has been relatively little litigation under the State ERAs, we have so far seen only the tip of the iceberg of the harm ERA can do.

A Federal ERA would not only extend the harm already done in the State ERA states, but it would sex-neuterize all federal laws such as the military draft and combat duty. A Federal ERA would also compel the drastic changes mandated by Section 2—the enforcement section which has the potential of causing such a massive shift of power from the states to the federal government that the changes accomplished by Section 1 would be dwarfed by comparison.

When the Equal Rights Amendment changes existing law, all its unique effects are unreasonable to society or harmful to women. ERA has no uniquely beneficial results.

SOCIAL SECURITY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, last week a most interesting guest editorial on social security, by a Senate staffer with whom I have had many pleasant dealings, was published in the Wall Street Journal. I would like to share it with my colleagues. Entitled "A Looming Federal Surplus," the article makes several interesting points about the implications of the 1983 Social Security Amendments.

Probably the most important point Stu Sweet makes is that the old-age survivors and disability insurance funds are now projected by the Social Security Administration to run increasingly large annual surpluses in the years ahead. Between now and 2000, the funds are projected to take in over $1 trillion more than they spend out under current law. This forecast is conservative because it assumes the economy performs below expectation and demographic developments are rather unfavorable to the funds. So, word should go out that the 98th Congress achieved what I consider one of its most important objectives. It protected the financial security of millions of vulnerable Americans who must depend on monthly social security checks for their survival.

However, whether succeeding generations receive the benefits that are now being promised to them depends, in part, on the willingness of future Congresses to keep a long-term planning horizon in mind when modifications in social security are considered. That is because a large surplus, well into the trillions, will have to be created to finance the retirement of the baby boom generation. It was, therefore, wise to return OASDI to off-budget status in 1992, as the 1983 amendments did, to protect the surplus from would be raiders.

On the other hand, care must be taken to insure that the surplus does not become too large. Otherwise, as Mr. Sweet points out, the Federal Government will be forced to buy an enormous sum of corporate securities, probably upsetting the economic balance between the public and private sectors that has benefited our country so well.

Mr. President, I ask to enter this article into the RECORD at this time along with an article prepared by the Social Security Administration last October concerning the long-term financial status of the OASDI funds.

The material follows:

A LOOMING FEDERAL SURPLUS

(By Stuart J. Sweet)

Most Americans were relieved when Congress and President Reagan last year approved, with practically no change, the bipartisan plan submitted by the National Commission on Social Security Reform to "save the system." What they don't know is that the plan stands to lead to more sweeping changes in the American economy than if the South had won the Civil War. The cause for alarm is peculiar: For the next 40 years, the Social Security cash-benefits programs are too well funded.

Currently, the collective balances in the Old Age and Survivors (OAS) and the Disability Insurance (DI) trust funds are only $27 billion. However, the surplus is projected by actuaries of the Social Security Administration (SSA) to exceed $1 trillion before the beginning of the next century—even if the economy performs below expectations and unfavorable demographics are assumed. By 2010, the surplus is projected to soar to more than $5 trillion, then to $10 trillion by 2020 before peaking at $20 trillion in the 2040s.

The challenge facing American government is illustrated by the accompanying chart. It shows that an enormous amount of funds must be accumulated to pay off the promises being made to existing workers and their children.

And one doesn't have to be a cynic to see how tempting it will be for politicians to spend "surplus funds" that won't be needed for nearly 60 years. Who believes they will be able to resist handing out new benefits when a $20 trillion surplus will accumulate in OASDI funds if they forbear? In today's terms, that would be like asking Congress not to tamper with an OASDI balance of more than $1 trillion.

If Congress refuses to undo what it did in 1983, probably the only way that today's workers and their children can be assured that Social Security promises will be honored is through passage of a constitutional amendment. Such an amendment will have to forbid Congress from distributing OASDI funds without the consent of those who provided them.

But the problems do not end there. They only begin, and some are quite surprising given the fiscal concerns that dominate political dialogue today. The first vexing problem is: How does the government invest $20 trillion without violating traditional boundaries between the public and private sectors?

Under current law, the treasury secretary, the secretary of health and human services, and the secretary of labor are the trustees of OASDI funds. They must invest any cash balances in the funds in U.S. Treasury securities. With the U.S. debt held by nonfederal entities at more than $1.1 trillion and with less than $30 billion in OASDI assets, limited investment choices have not been a problem. But they will be a problem unless the government commits itself to 40 years of large federal deficits in the non-OASDI portions of the budget. Otherwise, there will not be enough Treasury debt to purchase!

What, then, will we do with a growing, massive federal surplus? The options are not attractive. One choice would be to buy publicly traded stocks. But even this has limited possibilities. Right now, the New York Stock Exchange has a market value of less than $3 trillion. And so we really want cabinet officers deciding which Fortune 1000 companies the federal government will take over by buying controlling interests? It may, in fact, be possible for the government to own all of them. There are many opportunities for manipulation. It's possible to imagine Congress and the administration being lobbled by shareholders in certain concerns to buy their shares rather than those of other companies. Bonds do not offer a way out either. While purchasing bonds avoids direct-ownership problems, there will not be enough bonds to go around in 2010 either.

The reason this dangerous accumulation was created is simple: politics. In 1982, the Social Security Commission, whose members were chosen by congressional leaders and the president, decided that any solution it recommended would leave no chance that Congress would ever face another OASDI funding shortage in this century. That meant contingency planning, assuming the worst was going to happen. The commission concluded that OASDI needed an increase in cash flow during the 1980s equal to $175 billion to $200 billion, an average of $25 billion a year. This was nearly three times the needed increase estimated by the SSA in 1982.

Another way to visualize this is to consider what the negative each flow would have been, assuming a continuation of prior experience. During 1982, which was a poor year for OADSI due to the recession, the funds lost $11 billion. If the recession had continued throughout the 1980s, the funds would have lost about $11 billion a year for seven years, a total of $77 billion. Assuming that the recession was going to last longer than the Great Depression of the 1930s is certainly cautious planning. The commission can be excused for not anticipating the robust recovery already under way. But was it necessary to increase the estimate for needed cash almost threefold even if one extrapolates bad times into the future?

The Social Security Administration didn't think so. In its annual report to Congress in 1982, it forecast that checkbook balances in OASDI would drop, under its likely but pessimistic scenario, from a positive $19 billion to a negative $54 billion in 1989. This $73 billion drop is a serious shortage, but it was only a fraction of the $175 billion to $200 billion that the commission chose as its baseline.

Congress's own budget office didn't believe $175 billion to $200 billion was needed either. In November 1982, the Congressional Budget Office projected OASDI balances through 1989. Its forecast showed that the combined checkbook balances would fall even less—to a negative $29 billion in 1989, unless Congress acted. The effect of political over-caution was to generate a power curve toward a $20 trillion dilemma.

We must see that the huge fund buildup engineered by the Social Security Commission never takes place. If $20 trillion never accumulates, we won't have to worry about breaking commitments by future raids on OASDI. And we won't have to invest it. To do so, however, a contract must be reached with today's workers. In exchange for permanently reducing their OASDI taxes, workers under 50 years of age must agree to lower their claims on OASDI benefits during the 21st century.

How could this be accomplished? One sound suggestion is to expand the use of IRAs or comparable savings vehicles to individuals under certain conditions. The chief condition is that favorable tax treatment of deposits into such accounts be linked to reduced OASDI benefits received at retirement. One approach would be to reduce benefits by 1% for a specified level of deposits. Chances are, millions would leap at the opportunity. Since skepticism remains deep, especially among the young, over whether benefits ever will be collected, it should be an appealing offer to give up 1% of nothing and get a tax break now and for years to come.

A final note: If the economy performs better than expected—and the odds of that happening equal the odds assumed by the commission that it will perform below expectations—the surplus projected by the SSA for 75 years from now is $73 trillion. And the administration, taking account of the current recovery, has released figures showing an even more favorable trend. Meanwhile, the bipartisan group composed of congressional and administration representatives that is working on the fiscal 1985 budget, which begins next Oct. 1, was quick to agree on just one thing: Don't tamper with the Social Security compromise.

Long-Range Projections of Social Security Trust Fund Operations in Dollars

(By Harry C. Ballantyne, A.S.A. Chief Actuary)

Some interest has been expressed in the dollar values of the estimated long-range projections of the operations of the combined Old-Age and Survivors Insurance (OASI) and Disability Insurance (DI) Trust Funds as well as the operations of the combined OASI, DI, and Hospital Insurance (HI) Trust Funds. Long-range projections typically are not shown as dollar amounts because of the noncomparability of such monetary units over time when inflation is taken into account. Instead, relative measures which are comparable over time have been developed. Two examples of such measures are cost rates and income rates, which express the cost and income of the program as percentages of taxable payroll. Another is the trust fund ratio, which expresses the assets of the Trust Funds as a proportion of the outgo during a specific period of time, usually the next year. These measures are discussed fully in the "1983 Annual Report, Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance and Disability Insurance Trust Funds" [1] (1983 OASDI Trustees Report). They are the ones that have been used by Social Security program planners and legislators to evaluate the long-range status of the program and the long-range effect of proposed changes to the program. Nonetheless, in view of the interest that continues to be expressed in long-range dollar values, this note presents long-range OASDI projections in current dollars together with several indices which can be used ot convert current dollars into constant dollars. In addition, the Appendix to this note presents financial projections of a more limited nature for the HI program and for the combined OASDI and HI programs.

Table 1 shows projections of the operations of the combined OASI and DI Trust Funds—that is, assets at the beginning of the year, tax income, total income, outgo, and assets at the end of the year. The footnotes in the table define these items. The projections are based on four sets of economic and demographic assumptions identified as Alternatives I, II-A, II-B, and III, which are described in detail in the 1983 OASDI Trustees Report. The projections of all these financial items are shown in current dollars.

A major consideration in converting current dollars to constant dollars is the selection of the index of conversion. Price indices adjust for the effects of price inflation. One price index presented in this note is the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers (CPI-W), which is published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, Department of Labor. The CPI-W was chosen mainly because it is used to determine automatic increases in OASDI benefits. Another price index presented is the Implicit Price Deflator for the Gross National Product, hereafter referred to as the GNP deflator. Also shown are the GNP values themselves.

Wage indices adjust for the combined effects of price inflation and real-wage growth. The particular wage index presented in this note is the average annual amount of total wages. This wage series is used to adjust many of the Social Security program amounts that are subject to automatic adjustment (such as the contribution and benefit base).

Payroll indices adjust for the effects of variations in the number of workers as well as for the effect of price inflation and real-wage growth. This note presents the OASDI taxable payroll, which consists of all earnings subject to OASDI tax rates (including deemed wages based on military service), adjusted to reflect the lower tax rates (in comparison with the combined employee-employer rate) which apply to self-employment income through 1983, tips, and multiple-employer "excess wages."

The application of an interest rate is another way of converting dollar values through time. The selection of an interest rate can be based on many types of investments, such as those by individuals, groups, or the Social Security trust funds. The particular series of interest-rate indices presented in this note is based on the interest rates for special public-debt obligations issuable to the Social Security trust funds, which form the basis of the interest calculations done for the 1983 OASDI Trustees Report.

The CPI-W, after several years of varying increases, is assumed to increase annually by rates of 2, 3, 4, and 5 percent under alternatives I, II-A, II-B, and III, respectively. Similarly, the average annual wage is assumed to increase by 4.5, 5, 5.5, and 6 percent. After the first few years, no specific assumption is made about GNP growth; rather its projection is based on the complex interaction of many economic and demographic variables. Similarly, the projection of payroll growth is based on the interaction of many economic and demographic variables. Appendix A of the 1983 OASDI Trustees Report discusses the payroll projections more fully. The ultimate interest rate assumed is 5.06, 5.575, 6.08, and 6.575 percent under Alternatives, I, II-A, II-B, and III, respectively. These assumptions are the result of the compound effect of the ultimate annual increases assumed for the CPI-W (2, 3, 4, and 5 percent) with the respective ultimate real-interest rate assumptions (3, 2.5, 2, and 1.5 percent).

Table 2 shows these economic variables or functions thereof. The form of these tables is similar to that of the tables on Trust Fund operations in order to facilitate constant-dollar calculations that may be of interest to economic and financial analysts. It is left to the individual analyst to decide which variable to use to accomplish his or her particular purpose.

[1] Assets at the end of the calendar year are the total monies in the OASI and DI Trust Funds at that time, including the net effect of interfund loans and the payments to and reimbursements for the noninsured persons described below. Assets at the beginning of the calendar year are the assets at the end of the prior year increased by the advanced tax transfers for January. Both columns of assets reflect interfund-borrowing transfers which are not included in either the income or outgo figures.

[2] Tax income consists of net OASDI payroll taxes and, after 1983, taxes on benefits; for 1983 it includes the amount transferred from the general fund of the Treasury to the OASI and DI Trust Funds on May 20, 1983, for costs of noncontributory wage credits for military service performed before 1957.

[3] Total income consists of tax income, interest income, and payments from the general fund of the Treasury for costs of benefits paid to certain noninsured persons who attained age 72 before 1968 and have less than three quarters of coverage.

[4] Outgo consists of benefits payments, administrative expenses, net transfers under the financial interchange between the OASI and DI Trust Funds and the Railroad Retirement Account, payments for vocational rehabilitation services for disabled beneficiaries, and payments to the noninsured persons described above.

[1] The CPI is a modification of the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers (CPI-W) as defined by the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS), Department of Labor. The CPI-W is the index on which OASDI automatic benefit increases are based. For a given year, the modification divides the average of the 12 monthly CPI-W values by the analogous 1983 value and multiplies the result by 100, thereby initializing the CPI-W at 100 in 1983.

[2] The GNP deflator is a modification of the implicit Price Deflator for Gross National Product as defined by BLS; the modification initializes the implicit Price Deflator for GNP at 100 in 1983.

[3] Average wage is the average annual amount of total wages; it is the index used in the calculations of initial benefits and the contribution and benefit base.

[4] Taxable payroll consists of total earnings subject to taxes credited to the OASI and DI Trust Funds, including deemed wages based on military service; these earnings are adjusted to reflect the lower effective tax rates (compared to the combined employee-employer rate) which apply to tips, multiple-employer "excess wages," and self-employment income through 1983.

[5] The compound interest-rate factor is based on the interest rates for special public-debt obligations issuable to the OASI and DI Trust Funds. Each can be used to convert dollar values between July 1, 1983, and July 1 of the year shown.

APPENDIX

This appendix presents OASDI and HI tax income and outgo as projected under Alternative II-B. The projections shown are more limited than the OASDI projections shown in the main part of this note because more detailed 75-year HI projections are not available. The reason for this unavailability of long-range HI projections is that the standard HI projection period is 25 years. In addition, negative assets are not projected for the HI program. Therefore, for example, because the HI Trust Fund is projected to be exhausted in 1990 under Alternative II-B, projected combined assets for OASDI and HI thereafter are unavailable. Consequently, because projections of assets are available for only such limited number of years, they have been omitted from this presentation. Similarly, because estimates of negative income are unavailable, projections of net interest income have been omitted.

The following table shows the tax income and outgo projected under Alternative II-B for the OASDI, HI, and the combined OASDI and HI programs. The footnotes in the table define these items. The form of this table is similar to that of table 7 in the main part of this note in order to facilitate constant-dollar calculations that may be of interest to economic and financial analysts.

TRIBUTE TO WILLIAM D. BARTH

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, the Small Business Administration announced recently that it has chosen William D. Barth, posthumously, for its prestigious Small Business Award as "Accountant Advocate of the Year." I understand that this award will be presented to Bill Barth's wife, Mary, in ceremonies scheduled at the White House on May 10, during Small Business Week.

I would like to take this opportunity to express my heartfelt congratulations to Mrs. Barth and her family for Bill's selection for this award which he so richly deserved. This award is a recognition of the many outstanding qualities of Bill Barth as an individual, and is a fitting tribute to his many accomplishments in his profession and in the small business community he served so long and well.

Mr. President, Bill Barth, who was a partner in the Chicago office of the international accounting firm of Arthur Andersen & Co., testified before the Senate Small Business Committee on a number of occasions. He was willing to give freely of his time and expertise to participate in issues of importance to the small business community, and his insights on capital formation and retention proposals to assist small business were always knowledgeable and thought provoking. Indeed, it was Bill Barth who first proposed while testifying before the Small Business Committee in 1978 that a new hybrid security should be created to give small businesses access to capital without forcing them to give up ownership in their business—the small business participating debenture (SBPD).

I first introduced legislation embodying this proposal in 1979 and have reintroduced similar legislation in each Congress. This proposal was overwhelmingly adopted as one of the top five recommendations of the White House Conference on Small Business in 1980 and was the top recommendation of the participants at the SEC's first annual Government-business forum in 1982.

On October 28 of last year, the first Congressional hearing was held on this important proposal (S. 842) before the Senate Finance Committee Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management. Bill Barth, who continued to work hard and seek support for S. 842 at every opportunity, cut short a long-awaited vacation to testify. He was able to report that the SBPD had gained the support of nearly 100 small business and professional organizations and 140 Members of the Senate and the House. And consistent with Bill Barth's desire to give credit to others while putting himself in the background, Bill did not even mention his original connection with this measure.

Mr. President, Bill Barth enjoyed the professional respect of the small business community for many good reasons. His entire professional life of 35 years was dedicated to the cause of small business. He showed this dedication by building a separate practice organization within Arthur Andersen & Co. devoted solely to small business enterprises. He elevated the public discussion of national small business issues, and brought to bear on these issues a lifetime of experience and a high order of technical skills in accounting, tax, and management. His ideas and initiatives were always sound and original and found overwhelming support in the small business community.

In 1980, Bill Barth was one of the significant participants in the White House Conference on Small Business, and headed up its task force on inflation. He was later appointed to the National Advisory Council of the Small Business Administration where he served with distinction on its tax and secondary market committees. In addition, he was a member of the Small Business Committee of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants since its founding in 1981 and was coauthor of the small loan pension class exemption submitted to the Department of Labor in 1983.

Over the past 5 years, Bill Barth spoke out repeatedly before the Small Business and Tax Writing Committees of Congress, faithfully representing the interest of America's 14 million small businesses on the important tax and capital formation policy questions before them. Even at the time of his death Bill Barth was returning from an Atlanta meeting of the Small Business Committee of the American Institute of Certified Public Accountants, and was attempting to help organize a second White House Conference on Small Business.

Mr. President, through these attainments, Bill Barth has left a legacy of high regard for small business enterprise throughout the country. He will be remembered for this and for the high qualities of dedication, decency, and fairness with which he went about his work. The small business community has lost much with his passing and he will be missed. It is only fitting that Bill Barth has been chosen to be honored before those he represented so well—small business—as this year's small business "Accountant Advocate of the Year."●

IS THE U.S. SERIOUS ABOUT SOVIET TREATY VIOLATIONS?

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, in his statement of June 1982 before the United Nations Special Session on Disarmament, President Reagan observed that, "agreements genuinely reinforce peace only when they are kept. Otherwise we are building a paper castle that will be blown away by the winds of war." The President's observation was correct, and it has direct bearing on the issue of how serious the Soviets will take the U.S. commitment to effective verification and treaty compliance.

The integrity of the arms control process as a means of promoting international stability and U.S. security interests is critically dependent upon the strict compliance of all parties bound by the agreements. Thus, the President's report to the Congress concerning Soviet arms control treaty violations raises serious questions regarding the Soviet commitment to genuine arms control and global stability. Included in the charges of Soviet noncompliance is the likely violation of the nuclear testing yield limit of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty.

I am, therefore, concerned with continued reports—the most recent being a New York Times story of March 23—that advisers in this administration responsible for arms control policy are counseling support for Senate ratification of the Threshold Test Ban and Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaties. It seems that some have adopted the Soviet line of reasoning to the effect that existing verification/compliance problems will be resolved once the Senate ratifies the agreements. This line of argument is clearly at odds with the facts; independent, effective verification cannot be achieved under the terms of the accords as currently constituted.

I can think of few actions that would so thoroughly undermine the credibility of the President's Treaty Violations Report or the credibility of this administration's commitment to verifiable arms reduction than support for Senate ratification of the TTBT and PNE Treaties. I would urge the President to hold his ground and continue to seek agreement with the Soviets on improved verification provisions, including meaningful on-site inspection, to insure that the United States can effectively and independently verify Soviet compliance with the nuclear testing treaties.

In addition to the New York Times article, I ask that a recent report from the Heritage Foundation, "A Flawed Test Ban Treaty," be printed in the RECORD for the consideration of my colleagues.

The material follows:

U.S. ENVOY LOOKS TO SOVIET TALKS ON A NEW CULTURAL EXCHANGE PACT

(By Bernard Gwertzman)

WASHINGTON, March 22.—Arthur A. Hartman, the United States Ambassador to the Soviet Union, said today that the two countries were involved in talks that "could lead to some kind of progress on the more serious issues."

He said he hoped for a resumption of talks on a cultural and scientific exchange agreement. Negotiations on exchanges and on establishing consulates in New York and Kiev were about to the revived last summer when President Reagan ordered a suspension in response to the downing of a South Korean airliner by a Soviet plane.

The exchange agreement expired in 1980 and was not renewed by the Carter Administration because of the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan. The establishment of the additional consulates was also canceled by President Carter.

In another East-West forum, the European security talks in Stockholm, the Soviet Union was said to be testing NATO interest in a statement renouncing the use of force to clear the way for a resumption of arms talks. [Page A8.]

Ambassador Hartman returned to Washington several days ago for the second time in less than a month to consult and to talk to outside groups in an effort to promote support for a more positive approach to dealing with the Soviet Union. He has been cautious on the possibilities because of what he perceives to be a power struggle involving the new leader, Konstantin U. Chernenko, and others in the Politburo.

"It is very difficult for me to say today what their policies are," Mr. Hartman said on the NBC News program "Today." "For one thing, I think that there are differences of opinion within Moscow. There is perhaps some competition for leadership."

Another official said the Government was debating whether to ask the Senate to approve two nuclear treaties with the Soviet Union. One, limiting underground weapon tests to the equivalent of 150 kilotons of TNT, was signed in 1974; the other, on monitoring nuclear explosions for peaceful purposes, was signed in 1976. They have never been acted on.

Kenneth L. Adelman, director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, said in an interview, "There are people in the Administration who want to go ahead with these two treaties, and people who don't want to."

Mr. Adelman would not say what his position was, but other officials have said that Senate approval is being sought by the State Department and is opposed by the Pentagon, wth Mr. Adelman's position ambiguous.

He said the National Security Council had met twice on the subject.

Mr. Adelman said those advocating approval argue that a treaty signed by a President should be brought to the Senate for approval. A second reason cited for Senate action is that the United States and the Soviet Union have already agreed not to violate the 150-kiloton limit.

He said the advocates also argue that ratification would make it easier to verify compliance because each side would be required to turn over geological data about test sites and allow some on-site inspection.

Mr. Adelman said those opposed were dissatisfied with the verification aspects and felt that a Senate debate would divert attention from more important arms control talks.

In a report to Congress last January, the Administration said that, although information was questionable because of the difficulties involved, it was "likely" that there had been some Soviet underground explosions over the 150-kiloton limit. The Russians have also accused the United states of violating the limit. Both sides have denied doing so.

Ratification by the United States was cited by Mr. Chernenko in a speech on March 2 as the kind of concrete measures by which the United States could "prove its peaceableness be deeds."

Mr. Hartman met with Foreign Minister Andrei A. Gromyko 10 days ago, and Secretary of State George P. Shultz conferred with Anatoly F. Dobrynin, the Soviet Ambassador, at about the same time.

"We have tried over the last little while to see whether or not it is possible to begin to get at discussions of some problems that separate us," Mr. Hartman said on the "Today" program. "We are trying to see whether it is possible through diplomatic channels to begin to deal with some of these issues.

"I think there is a readiness for dialogue. The question is, is there a readiness to sit down and really discuss substantive issues, for example, to go back into the arms control talks."

The Russians quit the talks after deployment of American missiles began.

"I think there is a readiness to discuss some of the bilateral issues," Mr. Hartman said. "I would hope, for example, that we would be soon able to talk more seriously about an exchange agreement. We are looking at a whole series of areas that perhaps could warm up the relationship, could lead to some kind of progress on the more serious issues."

He said there had been no discussion of a possible summit meeting.

"Our position on the whole question of a summit is that you have to to have something worthwhile to discuss," Mr. Hartman said. "We are now trying to see whether there are worthwhile things to discuss."

Lawrence S. Eagleburger, the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs, speaking today in Birmingham, Ala., attributed the problems in relations with the Soviet Union to the absence of strong leadership in Moscow.

He said there had been three Soviet leaders during the Reagan Administration and "this flux in the Kremlin has severely hampered the give-and-take of diplomacy in general, and of our arms control negotiations in particular."

"Productive negotiations require flexibility, and flexibility requires leadership that is willing to make difficult decisions and accept responsibility for them," he said.

A Flawed Test Ban Treaty

INTRODUCTION

In 1974, the United States and the Soviet Union negotiated and signed the Threshold Test Ban Treaty (TTBT), which limited underground nuclear testing to a maximum yield of 150 kilotons. Although the Treaty has never been approved by the U.S. Senate, the two countries pledged to observe the terms of the TTBT. The signing of the TTBT, and two years later, the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, was heralded by many as the beginning of the process leading to the long sought-after comprehensive ban on all nuclear testing. However, Soviet violations of the terms of the TTBT, combined with the lack of any verification guarantees, have caused the Treaty to become a symbol of the flawed premise of entering into international arms control agreements before securing ironclad verification requirements.

The TTBT bans underground nuclear tests for weapons that have explosive yields greater than the equivalent of 150,000 tons of TNT—over ten times the power of the bomb dropped on Hiroshima. If nuclear testing were limited, the hope was that the development of Soviet nuclear weapons would be limited, thus increasing U.S. security.

These hopes have floundered, as President Reagan's recent report to Congress on Soviet violations of arms control agreements clearly showed. Soviet noncompliance with TTBT, the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty, and the Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT) increases the possibility that Soviet nuclear weapons could overwhelm existing U.S. forces.

Even if effective verification procedures were accepted by Moscow, the Soviets have achieved military advantages that strongly suggest that ratification of the TTBT would be inimical to U.S. security interests. To redress the worsening strategic balance, further testing is required to achieve a number of extremely important improvements in U.S. nuclear weapons technology. Testing at higher yields and the continued development of nuclear defensive systems are also required. The TTBT effectively prevents any of these necessary measures, and thus reduces U.S. security.

THE SOVIET TESTING RECORD

Since the TTBT was negotiated, it has been criticized alike by arms control apologists and by arms control skeptics. Arms control enthusiasts regard the 150-kiloton testing limit as much too high. Skeptics feel that the Treaty would freeze the great Soviet advantage in high-yield warheads, hinder U.S. efforts to undo the harm done by the "assured destruction" doctrine of the McNamara era,[1] and limit the U.S. to weapons not optimal for attacking hardened or protected military targets.

Skeptics also argue that the Treaty is basically unverifiable. The reason: a factor of two uncertainty exists concerning the method for estimating the yields of Soviet underground nuclear tests. Critics contend that, with current test measuring capabilities, a test at 150 kilotons would occasionally appear on the measuring instruments to be 300 kilotons, and more important, occasionally appear to be only 75 kilotons. Finally, the TTBT would prevent testing of nuclear weapons designed for the defensive purpose of attempting to minimize nonmilitary casualties and damage from a nuclear exchange.

When the first evidence of Soviet testing well above the TTBT limit came to light in 1976, the initial U.S. government response was to stop releasing reports of Soviet nuclear test yields to the public. The next step was a search for some scientific basis to cast doubt on the yield estimates themselves. In 1977, the Carter White House ordered the intelligence community to adopt a new methodology that in effect cut estimates of these yields in half. Within a year of this change, the Soviets nearly doubled the yields of their underground testing and again appeared to be in violation of the TTBT.

During this period there were press reports, since confirmed by the Reagan Administration, of Soviet tests with estimated yields (or central values, the middle of the range of estimates of possible yields) well above 150 kilotons.[2] The Carter Administration responded by withholding the facts and making misleading statements to the public. One explanation was: "There have been a number of Soviet tests of which the best estimate is that they are rather close to the 150-kiloton limit. Because there is almost a factor of two uncertainty in either direction, they could be bigger than 150 kilotons by quite a lot, or they could be smaller by quite a lot."[3] On the opposing side, Harold Agnew, former director of the Los Alamos Laboratory, stated that these "tests appeared to us to range as high as 400 kilotons, based on detection criteria in effect at the time of the initial agreement."[4]

The Reagan Administration is under pressure to ratify the TTBT. In May 1982, several U.S. Senators urged the President to ask for the ratification of the TTBT.[5] In response, the White House dramatically revealed U.S. concern regarding Soviet compliance with the TTBT. Then in July of 1982, Eugene Rostow, director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, stated, "Indeed, we have real concerns about the number of tests conducted by the Soviets since the TTBT and Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty (PNET) agreements were signed."[6] In March 1983, President Reagan told a news conference that "we have every reason to believe there have been numerous violations" of TTBT. In January 1984, the President released a report to Congress on Soviet arms control treaty violations, which noted ambiguities in the available evidence, but concluded that some Soviet tests constituted likely violations of the TTBT.

The Administration's position on the TTBT remains that the U.S. should not ratify the treaty unless the Soviets agree to improve verification procedures. The U.S., meanwhile, continues to adhere to the 150-kiloton limit, despite Soviet rejection of any further negotiations on the subject.

THE TECHNIQUE OF VERIFICATION

Determination of a Soviet treaty violation is based upon interpretations of signals received thousands of miles away from the Soviet test sites.[7] Seismic signals travelling such a long distance through the ground can be distorted substantially. This distortion is known as "path bias." Since the seismic waves from Soviet tests pass through geologic formations very different from those for U.S. tests, there is no assured basis for comparison. Any path bias assumption is at best an educated guess; there is no way of being confident that the estimate is accurate.

Seismic waves generated by different Soviet tests in the same area, however, would be subject to the same path bias, and thus can be compared to each other with great accuracy. This is significant because a pattern of Soviet testing at the same sites has developed that strongly suggests, in spite of the uncertainties inherent in U.S. estimation of Soviet yields, that the Soviets are in fact actually violating the TTBT. Most of the Soviet nuclear tests that appear to be over 150 kilotons occur in one area: The Shagan River test site in Eastern Kazakhstan in Central Asia.

Rather than directly challenge the Soviet Union, the Carter Administration decided in 1977 to introduce path bias assumptions into the calculations of Soviet test yields, thereby reducing their yield estimate[8] (see chart on page 5). Tests that had previously appeared to U.S. specialists to be in the range of 300 kilotons—a TTBT violations—were "corrected" by path bias and declared in compliance with the TTBT. In the words of one expert, "We [the U.S.] have normalized our criteria for detection in order to reconcile the seismic signals received to keep Soviet tests within the 150-kiloton limit." [9]

Within a year, the Soviets had begun testing at levels that again appeared to violate the TTBT by roughly a factor of two. Because these tests took place at the same test site, there was no doubt that the test yields had increased in a way that could be compared to previous tests. These tests had already been corrected for path bias and yet, again, appeared to be nearly twice the 150-kiloton TTBT limit.

The Soviet tests after 1978 are about twice as powerful as the tests conducted between 1976 and 1978. Thus, if the Soviet tests between 1976 and 1978 were in the 150-kiloton range, those after 1978 must be 300 kilotons or more—clearly in violation of the 150-kiloton limit.

If the post-1978 tests were under the 150-kiloton limit, the earlier tests must have been under 75 kilotons to account for the increased percentage. This would mean that the Soviet Union for almost three years was testing at less than half the negotiated testing limit. Given the Soviet record of stretching arms control agreements to their limits and beyond, the contention that they tested at such a low level for such an extended period strains credulity.

In fact, Soviet military requirements provide a great incentive for testing at the Treaty maximum or beyond. In the late seventies, the Soviet Union introduced a new series of improved intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBMs), including the SS-17, SS-18 Mod 4, and the SS-19 Mod 3.[10] The megaton range yields associated with these missile warheads strongly suggest that it would have been unlikely for the Soviets to deploy these weapons without testing well above 150 kilotons. The incentive for future Soviet testing above the Treaty limit is the development and deployment of a new generation of warheads designed specifically to destroy U.S. missile silos.

Although questions concerning compliance cannot be resolved completely with currently available technical data, informed and reasonable judgments can be made. The pattern of testing indicates that Moscow continues to test at levels far above the TTBT limit but within the factor of two uncertainty the U.S. believes it can assess. U.S. estimates of Soviet yields already have been "corrected" once for path bias. Thus the inescapable conclusion, from a TTBT verification standpoint, is that the uncertainty factor on yield verification must approach four if the Soviets are to be judged in compliance. This serious technical uncertainty, combined with the Soviets' powerful military incentives to violate the Treaty, must call into serious question the desirability of its ratification by the U.S.

IMPROVING TTBT VERIFICATION

The fundamental problem with the TTBT, as with most arms control agreements, is verification. First, underground testing by its very nature precludes collecting the information about nuclear design and yield that could be obtained by observing the explosion. Second, the TTBT is the only modern arms control treaty that does not ban deliberate concealment that would impede verification. Under the TTBT, it is perfectly legal to conceal everything about a nuclear test and engage in deliberate deception. For example, exploding a nuclear device in a cavity tends to reduce its seismic signal and makes the explosion and its yield appear smaller than they are. No improvement in seismic detection would reduce significantly the margin of uncertainty regarding yields of underground nuclear explosions. The verification problem lies not in recording the seismic signals but in interpreting what those signals mean.

It would not be possible to eliminate all the uncertainty about Soviet nuclear testing yields even if all U.S. verification proposals were accepted. Moscow could still cheat. But reduction of the current margin through cooperative verification procedures could reduce substantially the military significance of possible Soviet cheating under the TTBT.

It has been suggested that adequate verification might be achieved because the TTBT specifies exchanges of data following ratification. Yields of two past explosions in each designated "geophysically distinct" (undefined in the Treaty) testing area would be exchanged. However, the Soviet Union could provide false yields if they were testing at above the 150-kiloton limit. Thus, such yield information would change nothing. Data about certain elementary physical properties of the test sites would be a secondary part of this exchange. Knowledge of these properties, even if assumed to be accurate, would be of little help unless the Soviets provided detail far beyond that specified in the Treaty. This is highly unlikely, given past and current Soviet attitudes.

The data exchange mandated by the TTBT could even worsen matters because it would create a legitimized channel for Soviet misinformation. There would be no verification that the data concerning calibration shots were correct.[11] The yield data the Soviets provide in two sets could be false and intended to give the impression that all Soviet tests were a lower yield.

What kind of agreement would improve yield estimation so that compliance with the TTBT could be verified? Clearly, ti would be necessary to obtain independently verified data that allowed less ambiguous yield estimates. The specific U.S. proposal is for a direct yield measurement obtained by inserting a cable down the emplacement hole into the vicinity of the explosion. The cable would measure the speed with which the explosion energy travels out through the ground, allowing much more accurate yield estimates. U.S. personnel would be required at Soviet test sites, and Soviets would monitor U.S. tests. Moscow, however, has rejected this approarch.

SOVIET COMPLIANCE WITH ARMS CONTROL AGREEMENTS

With adequate verification of the TTBT in doubt, the record of Soviet treaty noncompliance becomes even more relevant. It is no longer possible to doubt seriously Soviet violation and circumvention of existing arms control treaties. Said President Reagan, "I am sorry to say that there has been increasingly serious ground for questioning their compliance with arms control agreements that have already been signed and that we both have pledged to uphold."[12] Secretary of State George Shultz has characterized Moscow's behavior as a ". . . continuing practice of stretching a series of treaties to the brink of violation and beyond."[13] Nearly every agreement in this area has produced credible allegations of Soviet noncompliance.

When the Soviet Union apparently decided to conduct nuclear tests at yields that violated the TTBT, it did so after more than a decade of violations of the 1963 Limited Test Ban Treaty (LTBT). After an initial announcement by the Johnson Administration of a "technical violation" of the Treaty in 1964, the U.S. government neither insisted on Soviet compliance nor made any further announcements of additional LTBT violations. The Carter Administration refused to release any information concerning the Soviet venting of radioactive nuclear debris across its borders and even denied that such events violated the LTBT: "There have been venting cases in which radioactive nucleii have been detected outside the Soviet Union . . . again these are not clear violations. They are matters of stretching the limits of the agreement." [14]

The U.S. government, as early as the mid-1960s, signaled to the Soviet Union that it would not insist on strict Soviet compliance with arms control agreements. In addition, the Soviet Union saw the U.S. government rationalize a host of Soviet activities between 1973 and 1976 that either violated SALT I or circumvented its essential limitations. It would be understandable if the Kremlin concluded that the U.S. government would do nothing against Soviet testing above 150 kilotons. And indeed, the only U.S. responses were ineffectual démarches followed by predictable Soviet denials.

The Soviets soon may be able to deploy a new ICBM, contrary to SALT II Treaty limitations. It would have an advanced warhead, developed in violations of the TTBT, and would be defended by anti-ballistic missiles, in direct contradiction of the ABM Treaty. The lack of an American response to previous Soviet violations of arms control agreements enhances the possibility of this scenario.

THE TTBT AND U.S. SECURITY

Even if agreement could be reached assuring effective verification of the TTBT, serious questions arise as to the actual utility of limiting testing in the manner called for by the Treaty. Donald Kerr, Director of the Los Alamos Laboratory, has pointed out that "nuclear tests are essential for determining the proper functioning of nuclear explosives; calculations do not suffice, and there is no way to experimentally simulate the performance of a nuclear design." [15]

Because the U.S. has limited itself to very small missile systems, one objective of nuclear testing is to increase yield-to-weight ratios—the amount of nuclear explosive yields obtained from any given weight. Nuclear weapons are also frequently removed at random from the existing stockpile and tested to prove that they will have a given yield. Over the years the U.S. has conducted about 40 such tests.

In addition, the U.S. tests nuclear devices to correct problems that develop in weapons that have previously been placed in the stockpile. By 1978, there had been a dozen instances in which weapons required a nuclear test to repair a problem. If a problem with a nuclear weapon required a test over 150 kilotons, it could not be repaired under the TTBT.

The TTBT also limits development of new weapons types. New designs are constrained by the Treaty's test ceiling, and options for developing systems exceeding the 150-kiloton limitation must utilize existing designs to insure Treaty compliance.

The negative impact on U.S. security is even greater when probable Soviet TTBT violations are taken into account. Since 1978 the Soviets have conducted 15 nuclear tests that appear on U.S. instruments to have yields substantially above the 150-kiloton TTBT ceiling. The argument that no Soviet violations have occurred is technically plausible in the sense that one cannot prove it in a purely scientific manner, but it is extremely unlikely in a practical sense when other factors are taken into account.

The limitations the TTBT places on nuclear testing must also be viewed in the context of historical nuclear strategies. The introduction of the mutual assured destruction doctrine in the early 1960s [16] resulted in the termination of most major weapons systems other than the Minuteman and Polaris programs. The development of small missile systems carrying small warheads, such as the Minuteman III and the Poseidon, produced a combination that does not have the yield and accuracy capability to destroy hardened military targets. This shortcoming has been exacerbated by the deployment of Soviet ICBMs with the ability to destroy hardened U.S. targets.

To counter this new threat to U.S. deterrence and nuclear stability, the Accelerated Test Program was begin in the U.S. during the 1970s. A primary objective of this program was to seek out and develop new options for higher yield weapons to destroy hardened Soviet targets. Testing of any of these new weapons would be precluded under the TTBT if their yields increased by a substantial amount.

Supporters of the TTBT have argued that testing new designs at the higher yields needed is no longer necessary because nuclear weapons development is at a technological plateau and further design improvements cannot be achieved. On the contrary, Robert Woodward, Associate Director of Nuclear Design, and W. F. Scanlon, Deputy Director of Military Applications at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, point out that the so-called "plateau" is actually caused by the "imposed limits of the TTBT rather than the lack of anything technically new to be done." [17]

As a result of observing TTBT limitations, the U.S. has been forced to use older, less advanced designs for the MX and Trident II warheads because their tests were allowed at full yield only before the signing of the TTBT. There is a substantial risk in using these older plans. Very slight design changes often can improve dramatically the performance of nuclear weapons systems, rendering the older plans relatively obsolete. The warheads for the MX, Trident II, Mark 12A, the new bomb carried on the B-52, and the future B1-B bomber cannot be proof tested at full yield in their final deployed form under the TTBT. The MX, Trident II, and cruise missiles all have "options under research and development upon which nuclear testing has not been completed, and the U.S. would not certify them and place them into the strategic stockpile without having completed that nuclear testing." [18] Strategic deterrence systems have never been previously deployed with such uncertainties concerning their performance.

An additional problem facing the U.S. is the shortage of special nuclear materials, including plutonium and uranium-235, which comprise the basic building blocks of nuclear weapons.[19] This shortage might be averted through the development and deployment of higher kiloton nuclear warheads that use lower levels of special material to achieve their design yields. However, TTBT limits prohibit the testing, and hence the development and deployment, of these weapons with yields of more than a few hundred kilotons—precisely the type most needed today. The problem of critical nuclear material shortages, then, is exacerbated by the TTBT, thereby limiting the U.S. ability to meet the growing Soviet threat.

Besides requiring the use of older and less efficient designs for multibillion dollar strategic weapons, the TTBT limits the response to future Soviet military hardening programs. Any such Soviet fortifications will require the U.S. to deploy megaton and multimegaton yield weapons to maintain a credible deterrent.[20] It becomes imperative to test higher yield weapons systems that can penetrate these hardened targets because "it is not possible . . . to always accomplish the same objective with greater accuracy of delivery." [21] Yet there is no viable option of testing in this yield range.

Improved air defenses in the Soviet Union, not limited by any treaty,[22] also contribute to the need for larger testing yields. Bombers and cruise missiles must travel longer distances to overcome these air defenses, reducing the accuracy of their payloads. This in turn requires an increased yield from the weapons carried in order to offset the decreased accuracy if a target is to be effectively destroyed. The best response to this combination of new defense and hardened targets, the development of higher yield weapons, is precluded under the TTBT.

The ABM Treaty and the TTBT limits also essentially preclude the development of advanced U.S. defensive weapons, such as the ABM program and the so-called X-ray laser.[23] Yet Soviet ABM-related activites—research, testing, and radar deployment—create a real threat of violation or "breakout" from the ABM Treaty. There are four references to this possibility in the bipartisan Scowcroft Commission Report on Strategic Forces.[24] By violating both treaties, the Soviets may be able to deploy effective strategic defensive weapons, while the U.S., limited to exploratory research and development, will lack this capability. One option for meeting this threat would be for the U.S. to develop new strategic warheads, putting a great premium on nuclear testing above 150 kilotons.

CONCLUSION

When the U.S. revised its testing methodology in 1977, the Soviets responded by increasing their testing yields to over 300 kilotons. The Soviet Union apparently had some tests as high as 350-400 kilotons.

Testing at these yields enables the Soviet Union to develop new and improved nuclear weapons systems for its seemingly unending series of new missiles. At the same time, the U.S. limits itself to testing at 150 kilotons and cannot develop weapons suitable for use on its MX, Trident II, or Midgetman ICBM unless it adapts existing, older designs. The only other available option entails the serious risk that major new strategic systems will be deployed with warheads that will not deliver their expected yield because of the lack of appropriate testing.

When combined with the features of the SALT I and SALT II Treaties that favor the USSR, the TTBT gives Moscow a significant military advantage. This undoubtedly will grow with time. The Soviets have, in effect, boosted the yields at which they test. The higher the yields tested by the Soviets, the more the U.S. revises its methodology to legitimize these tests. The Soviet Union has tested and will continue to test at slightly more than twice the maximum allowable yield calculated by the U.S. at any given time. Thus, if the U.S. takes action in the future to legitimize Soviet tests now estimated at 300 kilotons or more, the Soviets will be able to test at 600 kilotons.

The TTBT is not verifiable and cannot be made verifiable by any procedure apparently acceptable to Moscow. The Soviets have rejected all negotiations concerning improved verification.

The United States, moreover, has sound national security reasons for not ratifying the TTBT. There is substantial evidence that the Soviet Union is cheating. The U.S. has clear military requirements for developing and testing weapons above 150 kilotons. If the current situation persists—in which the Soviets are probably testing at two to three times the Treaty limit—the U.S. will continue to fall behind the Soviet Union in strategic military power.

PERSECUTION OF THE BAHA'IS IN IRAN

● Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. President, the Kentucky General Assembly recently passed a resolution protesting the continuing persecution of the Baha'is of Iran.

Today, some 350,000 Baha'is in Iran, the nation's largest religious minority, live in fear and peril. Under an order issued last year, Baha'i religious activity was effectively banned and a legal foundation for charging all members of the faith with criminal activity set. A number of the Baha'i faith have been brutally executed by Iranian authorities and many others have disappeared.

As a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 86, introduced last November, I believe it is incumbent upon us to continue to speak out on this denial of human rights and religious freedom in Iran and to continue to seek to bring world condemnation upon the Iranian Government for persecution of this nonviolent religious group.

I ask that the resolution passed by the Kentucky General Assembly be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution follows:

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION No. 14

A concurrent resolution requesting President Reagan, the Congress of the United States, and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights to continue their protest of the persecution and repression of the members of the Baha'i Faith in Iran.

Whereas the members of the Baha'i Faith have experienced severe repression and persecution since the inception of the revolutionary regime in Iran, and this persecution is growing in its severity; and

Whereas hundreds of Baha'is have been dismissed from their jobs or deprived of their businesses and trade licenses, and no children of Baha'i parentage have been allowed to register for school at any level; and

Whereas all Baha'i holy places, properties and cemeteries have been confiscated or distroyed; and

Whereas over three hundred Baha'is are currently imprisoned or have disappeared; and

Whereas over one hundred and forty Baha'is have been assassinated or executed in Iran since 1978, and those executed could have spared their lives by recanting their faith; and

Whereas in June of 1983 the authorities in Shiraz executed seventeen Baha'is, of whom ten were women and teenage girls who were devoted to the religious education of Baha'i children; and

Whereas the Iranian government issued an edict on August 29, 1983, outlawing Baha'i institutions and administrative bodies, and making membership in them a criminal offense; and

Whereas the Baha'i national administrative body of Iran, in compliance with the Baha'i principle of obedience to government, disbanded itself and some six hundred democratically elected local administrative bodies; and

Whereas despite the obedience of the Baha'is to the government of Iran, the arrest of Baha'is and the denial of their basic human rights continues; and

Whereas the members of the Kentucky General Assembly deplore the religious persecution of the Baha'is and the denial of their basic human rights; and

Whereas President Reagan, the Congress of the United States and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights have publicly condemned the persecution of the Baha'is of Iran: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, the House of Representatives concurring therein:

That President Reagan, the Congress of the United States and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights be commended for their protest of the religious persecution of the Baha'is of Iran, and urged to continue that protest, and further, that copies of this resolution be delivered to President Reagan, to each member of the Kentucky Congressional Delegation, to the Secretary General of the United Nations, and to the Local Spiritual Assembly of the Baha'is of Lexington, Kentucky.●

AMERICA'S YOUTH AND NUCLEAR WAR

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, it is sad to observe that Dr. Seuss, the talented author who has provided young and old with such marvelous entertainment as his book "Green Eggs and Ham" and has demonstrated such keen insight in "The Grinch Who Stole Christmas," has recently displayed a serious inability to make moral distinctions between freedom and totalitarianism. This lapse is clearly evident in his most recent book, "The Butter Battle Book."

Now, I am not in the habit of doing book reviews of children's stories, but I cannot fail to comment on the misguided message presented in this most recent work of Dr. Seuss. The story depicts the confrontation between two groups who are representative of Americans and Russians. Unfortunately, the principal thing that distinguishes the two sides from one another is the fact that the Yooks spread butter on the top of their bread while the Zooks spread it on the bottom. There is no moral dimension to the tension and dispute between the two sides—no recognition that the bottom line distinction in the real world is between freedom and totalitarianism.

The danger of this amoral message, which I suppose is intended to heighten our sensitivity to the "arms race" and the threat of nuclear war, is clearly identified in a recent commentary by Morton Kondracke. I would like to quote from Mr. Kondracke's commentary at some length. He writes:

Dr. Seuss neglects to inform children that there are real differences between the Yooks and the Zooks of this world. One side built the wall between them in order to keep its own people from moving to the other side. One side has repeatedly rolled its tanks into other countries to keep them enslaved. One side lets people speak, vote and worship freely; the other employs secret police and psychiatric prisons to keep people in line. One side is content to maintain the status quo in the world; the other side exports revolution and violence as a matter of principle.

The burden of Dr. Seuss's book is worse than the "Better Red Than Dead" message adopted by nuclear disarmament groups over the years. Dr. Seuss's message to American children is "Red? It's not so different." More subtly, the message is that to defend one's values is stupid, bigoted and dangerous to living things.

Mr. President, as a father, I am concerned by increasing indications that America's youth are being terrorized by a highly distorted view of the world that denigrates American military, including nuclear, preparedness, while failing to draw fundamental distinctions in purpose that divide the defenders of freedom from those whose only contribution to our world today are the symbols and substance of repression—the gulags and the Berlin Wall.

Mr. President, I ask that Mr. Kondracke's article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Mar. 21, 1984]

YOOKS, ZOOKS AND NUCLEAR TERROR

(By Morton Kondracke)

WASHINGTON.—It's perfectly appropriate—absolutely essential, in fact—for Americans to debate U.S. nuclear weapons policy. But is it necessary to terrorize and propagandize our children in the process?

The evidence is mounting that American children increasingly suffer from nightmares, depression and a fundamental conviction that they will not live long enough to grow up.

Some of the latest research is reviewed in the April issue of Psychology Today. One study, of graduating seniors from 130 high schools across the nation, by Jerald Bachman of the University of Michigan, showed that in 1975, about 7.2 percent of boys questioned said that they often worry about nuclear war, whereas in 1982, the figure was 31.2 percent.

Also in 1982, more than one-third of all high school seniors agreed with the statement "Nuclear or biological annihilation will probably be the fate of all mankind within my lifetime."

Psychology Today did not report on the attitudes of girls, but a Washington Post survey this February found that two-thirds of the female students interviewed feared that nuclear war would occur by the year 2000, compared to just under half of male students.

Fear of the U.S.-Soviet nuclear buildup was listed as the top concern of 64 percent of the young people (ages 13 to 17) interviewed by the Post. It ranked tops for just 43 percent of adults. Twenty-four percent of the young people said they had dreams about nuclear war, compared to 12 percent for adults.

This kind of evidence is often cited—especially by nuclear freeze groups—as an argument against President Reagan's nuclear policies.

But I think the real culprit in taumatizing children is the nuclear freeze movement itself, which has not been satisfied merely to conduct an adult debate on nuclear policy with the Reagan administration, but has used fear of a nuclear holocaust as a basic organizing tool.

It's perfectly true that administration officials spoke irresponsibly about the winnability of nuclear wars during their early months in office, but Reagan policies in fact have been little different from those of the Carter administration. Children had far fewer nuclear nightmares in 1980 than they do now.

The big changes occurring in the past three years are the rise of the freeze movement and the new attention that TV dramatists and movie producers have given to the topic.

Even more troubling than the terror induced in children are the ideological messages being given them by freeze advocates—most notably now by the legendary Dr. Seuss.

America's foremost writer of books for children—the man who gave us "Yertle the Turtle" and "The Grinch Who Stole Christmas"—has just published a new book, "The Butter Battle Book," whose not-very subliminal message to youngsters is that there is no essential difference between the United States and the Soviet Union, certainly none worth fighting for.

His characters aren't openly Americans and Russians of course, but Yooks and Zooks. They build a wall between them and then launch an arms race—all because Yooks spread butter on the top of their bread and Zooks spread it on the bottom.

As it's put by a Yook elder who works for the Zook-Watching Border Patrol, "You can't trust a Zook spreads bread underneath. Every Zook must be watched! He has kinks in his soul!"

In their enmity, the two sides first resort to slingshots to scare and deter each other, then cannons (like "the eight-nozzled, elephant-toted Boom-blitz" that shoots high-explosive sour cherry stone pits"), then airborne chemical warfare devices and, finally, the "Big Boy Boomeroo," which can blow them both to smithereens.

Dr. Seuss neglects to inform children that there are real differences between the Yooks and Zooks of this world. One side built the wall between them in order to keep its own people from moving to the other side. One side has repeatedly rolled its tanks into the other countries to keep them enslaved. One side lets people speak, vote and worship freely; the other employs secret police and psychiatric prisons to keep people in line. One side is content to maintain the status quo in the world; the other side exports revolution and violence as a matter of principle.

The burden of Dr. Seuss's book is worse than the "Better Red than Dead" message adopted by nuclear disarmament groups over the years. Dr. Seuss's message to American children is, "Red? It's not so different." More subtly, the message is that to defend one's values is stupid, bigoted and dangerous to living things.

Sure enough, such messages are getting through to America's youngsters. As Psychology Today notes, three years ago a group of teenagers founded the Children's Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, which has generated thousands and thousands of letters to President Reagan asking him to stop building nuclear weapons.

The article notes that researchers have found that Soviet children also fear nuclear war, though less intensely than American children, and that they, too, take action to prevent it—such as writing letters to people in NATO countries.

Which means, of course, that the children of the world are being mobilized against American nuclear preparedness. In the name of humanity, who is writing letters to General Secretary Cherenko?●

ORDER OF PROCEDURES—H.J. RES. 492 ON TOMORROW

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it is my understanding that at 11 a.m. the Senate will resume consideration of House Joint Resolution 492, the urgent supplemental appropriations bill for the Department of Agriculture. Pending at that time will be the Bumpers amendment No. 2886 on which there is a 1½-hour time limitation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

RECESS UNTIL TOMORROW AT 10 A.M.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, may I inquire of my friend, the minority leader, if he has further business to come before the Senate?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I know of nothing.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, in accordance with the order previously entered, that the Senate stand in recess until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, at 8:14 p.m., recessed until Wednesday, April 4, 1984, at 10 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, April 3, 1984

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Praise the Lord! Praise God in His sanctuary; praise Him in His mighty firmament! Praise Him for His mighty deeds; praise Him according to His exceeding greatness!—Psalm 150: 1, 2.

We pray, O God, that whatever virtue may be ours, we will ever remember to give praise and thanksgiving for Your gifts to us. May we, O gracious God, begin and end each day with words of petition and intercession, and always, words of adoration and gratitude. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 4072) entitled "An act to provide for an improved program for wheat."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2392. An act to authorize the President to appoint Donald D. Engen to the Office of Administrator of the Federal Aviation Administration.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON RULES TO FILE CERTAIN PRIVILEGED REPORTS

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight, April 3, 1984, to file certain privileged reports. This is the rule on the budget resolution and the privileged report on House Concurrent Resolution 282, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for the fiscal year 1985.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. WALKER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I know of no reason to object, except I just wanted to find out whether the fact that we are going to have a late filing on the rule is an indication that we may have an opportunity to vote on several budgets, rather than the kind of process we went through last year where we only had a couple options. Some of us on the House floor are interested in having the option of voting on some budgets that would not necessarily come out of the leadership. Is that a reality that is possible under the gentleman's request?

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOAKLEY. We are currently hearing the bill. We have 4 amendments and 10 substitutions and we are looking at them right now. My understanding is that there will be four or five different substitutes made in order.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR MEMBERS TO HAVE UNTIL 6 P.M. TODAY TO SUBMIT AMENDMENTS TO THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have until 6 p.m. today to submit amendments to the budget resolution for printing in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is the Private Calendar day. The Clerk will call the bill on the Private Calendar.

RESTORATION OF COASTWISE TRADING PRIVILEGES TO THE VESSEL "LA JOLIE"

The Clerk called the Senate bill (S. 1015) to clear certain impediments to the licensing of the vessel La Jolie for employment in the coastwise trade.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

THE 2-PERCENT ALTERNATIVE BUDGET

(Mr. STENHOLM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to put in a good word for the 2-percent solution, the alternative budget that will be offered this afternoon in the Rules Committee.

It is both fair and it provides a meaningful reduction in the deficit that we all talk so much about.

Mr. Speaker, $225 billion we propose can be reduced over the next 3 years.

Let me remind those who are going to be quick to criticize some of the specifics that this is the first budget resolution and it is a target. We are not talking about program suggestions. We are talking about a starting point.

To those who disagree on the numbers, let me say that I will be the first to join in doing better.

To those that are concerned about the taxes, we would say that we are proposing $2 in spending reductions for each $1 in new revenues.

To those who are concerned about the entitlement section, let me say in all sincerity that I believe that we will find throughout this Nation that those grandfathers and grandmothers that will be affected by this CPI minus 2 proposal are just as concerned about their grandchildren as they are the short-term problems associated with this particular item of our budget.

We believe that CPI minus 2 is a fair way to address this question. We believe that in the debate as we get into it that many Members of this House will come to agree.

Again, the 2-percent solution is a fair method of addressing the deficit. It is a starting point. Join me in supporting an alternative budget, the 2-percent solution that really does something to reduce the deficit.

BUDGET TIME IN THE HOUSE

(Mr. ROEMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Speaker, it is budget time in the House. There are three budget myths about which we must be careful this week.

Myth No. 1: Deficits are unimportant. Not true. The third largest item in the budget is interest on the national debt. Evidence grows that huge, never-ending deficits, add to uncertainty, raise interest rates and hurt most enterprises. Ask any farmer or small businessman if high interest rates help or hurt. Deficits are important and our budget ought to make significant deficit reductions.

Myth No. 2: Not to worry, we can grow our way out of the deficit problem. Not true. The deficits are too big and too well entrenched. The most optimistic growth forecasts show $100 billion plus deficits in 5 years. Now, growth is essential and must not be hampered, but growth alone is not enough.

Finally, myth No. 3: We can reduce the deficit and lower interest rates without sacrifice. Not true. The military must be disciplined. Entitlements have to be trimmed. Other spending has to be controlled. Tax reform is overdue.

Everyone with a stake in a strong, healthy America, must give something in this process. Sacrifice—even Members of Congress will be asked to give up something, maybe something as precious as their own pet myth.

THE LATE PETER J. MURPHY, JR., PROFESSIONAL STAFF MEMBER, HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE

(Mr. ADDABBO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of sorrow and deep personal loss that I announce the passing of my chief staff director on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, Peter J. Murphy, Jr.

Peter was born in Louisville, Ky., on November 23, 1924. He received his juris doctor degree in 1950 from the University of Louisville.

He served with the U.S. Marine Corps with great honor during World War II for over 3 years and was a tank commander with B Company, 3d Tank Battalion, 3d Marine Division. He served in the Guam and Iwo Jima invasions with total service in the Pacific area of over 26 months.

After leaving the Marine Corps, Pete was a special agent with the FBI for over 22 years. He worked primarily in counterespionage and general intelligence during his employment as special agent.

He joined our Committee on Appropriations back in 1968 and since June 1982, he has served as the staff director of the Subcommittee on Defense very ably.

Our prayers are with Peter and his wife, Eve, and his three sons and three daughters in this time of deep sadness.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the life, character, and public service of Peter Murphy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURTHA). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENTS TO PERMIT VOLUNTARY SCHOOL PRAYER, A BALANCED BUDGET, AND LINE-ITEM VETO

(Mr. GREGG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would hope to offer a unanimous-consent request calling for consideration of an amendment to permit voluntary school prayer, and especially the balanced budget and line-item vetoes since this is the week of the budget.

The Chair has ruled that in order to make these requests I must have the clearance of the majority and the minority leadership. This request has been cleared with the minority leadership. I would now yield to a spokesman from the majority leadership for appropriate clearance.

Mr. Speaker, I hear no response. That should make it clear to the American people who stands in the way of these three important issues, and especially the issue of balancing the Federal budget: the Democratic leadership of this House.

INVESTIGATION OF CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WARFARE

(Mr. McCOLLUM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McCOLLUM. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution which condemns the use and supplying of chemical and biological weapons and calls on the United States to take the lead in investigating the growing number of reports of the use of chemical and biological warfare in Iran and other parts of the world—and to take steps to bring these horrible and inhumane violations of international law to an end.

Last Friday the New York Times reported that "U.S. officials say they have obtained what they believe to be incontrovertible evidence that Iraq has used nerve gas in its war with Iran and is nearing completion of extensive sites for the mass production of the lethal chemical warfare agent." This is backed up by the findings of a U.N. scientific team which confirmed the use of mustard gas and tabun, a nerve gas. These recent developments follow reports from European hospitals that Iranian soldiers being treated there are suffering the effects of mycotoxins—commonly known as yellow rain.

The time has come for the United States to decisively respond to these grave reports about the use of chemical and biological warfare in Iran, Afghanistan, and southeast Asia. My resolution calls for the United States to increase its investigations of suspected instances of chemical and biological warfare—and to encourage the development of antidotes—especially for yellow rain. It also urges the United States to help U.N. investigators gain access to areas where the use of these weapons is suspected—and urges other nations to investigate suspected instances as well. Finally, it calls on the United States to negotiate with the Soviet Union and other nations to strengthen existing agreements and treaties regarding chemical and biological warfare by establishing an effective means to insure compliance with these longstanding international laws.

We cannot stand idly by and let these horrible moral and legal violations go on. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution and join together to bring worldwide pressure to stop this grave threat to our Nation and our world.

ANTI-SEMITISM IN AMERICA

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to share with my colleagues the findings of the 1983 report on anti-Semitism in America published by the anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith.

The report points to a significant decline in anti-Semitic incidents involving both personal violence and property vandalism. Specifically—there was a 41-percent drop in cases involving physical assaults and harassment and a 19-percent drop in incidents involving vandalism against Jewish institutions—businesses and homes between 1982 and 1983.

The ADL cites greater public awareness and concern combined with new State laws as the main reasons for the decline. Today 16 States have laws imposing stiff new penalties against persons who commit these crimes of religious violence and vandalism.

No one can—or should be satisfied until the evil of antireligious violence and vandlalism is wiped out. Even with the 1983 decline—there were still more than 1,000 incidents of anti-Semitism in this Nation—to me that is still unacceptable.

In 1981 I first introduced legislation to apply stiff new Federal penalties on those who engage in acts of religious violence and vandalism. In the 98th Congress, it is H.R. 473. It establishes graduated penalties for those convicted including life imprisonment in those cases which result in death.

Let us move to pass this bill so our efforts can continue to improve. Let us not wait for another synagogue to be desecrated or another priest or minister mugged before we take action.

DOWN-TO-EARTH BUDGET OF THE BUDGET COMMITTEE

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, President Reagan's talent for avoiding responsibility for 3 years of deficit spending was recently compared to "that daring young man on the flying trapeze * * * flying through the air with the greatest of ease."

Unfortunately, this year Mr. Reagan's budget requires a leap of faith so awesome as to leave even the Flying Walendas trembling in their leotards.

While Mr. Reagan claims his budget will cut future deficits by $150 billion, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office has found little fact in this representation.

The budget reported by the House Budget Committee provides a far more realistic approach. It calls for equal sacrifices from all Americans. It requires new taxes to pay for new spending, and it reduces future deficits by twice as much as Mr. Reagan's budget.

The President may have accomplished a triple somersault on deficit spending in the past 3 years but his aerobatics dazzles everyone's computer.

Mr. Speaker, it is time to adopt a down-to-earth budget and that is the budget plan sent to us by the Budget Committee.

Mr. Speaker, the following tables summarize the CBO findings on the Reagan budget proposals:

TABLE 1.—REPUBLICAN DEFICIT REDUCTION PLAN, FISCAL YEARS 1984–87

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 5042

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. McNULTY) be removed from the list of cosponsors of H.R. 5042.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

CONGRATULATIONS TO GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY BASKETBALL TEAM

(Mr. WOLF asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, we hear so much moaning and groaning and complaining and condemnation on this floor that I would like to bring something to the House floor today that everyone can agree on, and that is to commend the Georgetown University basketball team and their coach, John Thompson, and all of the members of the team for their outstanding victory. As a graduate of the Georgetown Law School I am particularly proud, but I know the people of the Washington metropolitan area are proud, too.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to take my hat off to the University of Virginia and their basketball team that came awfully close. We are proud of both of these teams.

REFORM OF THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

(Mr. GEKAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, there is no excuse, neither philosophical nor procedural, for any further delay in the consideration by this House of major issues, of major propositions having to do with reform of the criminal justice system.

We need in the Federal laws a death penalty statute to act as a deterrent and a punishment for an attempted Presidential assassination.

We need reform of bail procedures that too often lead to further crimes by people out on bail for a crime for which they are awaiting trial.

We need all kinds of reform in the criminal justice system not only for its sake alone but to send out that necessary signal to the criminal element that no longer are we going to tolerate the kind of freedom that they have against the citizens of our country, to prey upon them and to destroy homes, property, and lives.

We urge the Democratic leadership in the Judiciary Committee and from the Speaker's rostrum itself to do its job now and to make certain that the American public will be heard in the issues concerning criminal justice.

DEFICITS

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, again this morning we have heard the silliness expressed on the House floor of the fact that deficits are a Presidential problem and not a congressional problem.

Mr. Speaker, I think it should be clear to the American people that the problem of spending lies in this Congress. It is up to us in the budgets we adopt here and in the spending that goes along with those budgets to do something to resolve deficits.

□ 1220

The idea of coming to the floor here and suggesting that the President of the United States has some innate power in order to control deficits is, as I said before, silliness. What is happening in the committees of this Congress and what is happening on this floor shows that this Congress has no desire whatsoever to trim budget deficits. In the Committee on Science and Technology this morning we discussed energy authorizations. In order to get them just back to the President's figure we had to cut 5.7 percent of the authorization we had before us.

I offered such an amendment. It was rejected by an almost party line vote. We had a rejection of just getting it back to the President's budget deficit, which is $175 billion that we hear discussed on this floor.

It is high time that we recognize that what we are doing in this Congress is we are spending our way into the budget deficits. Unless we get some control of the spending patterns of this Congress we will continue to have deficits and the President will not even figure into the picture.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

NATIONAL POW/MIA RECOGNITION DAY

(Mr. BURTON of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, it has now been over 11 years since the Paris peace accords were signed bringing an end to the Vietnam war. Unfortunately, we left one problem unresolved. We left nearly 2,500 men unaccounted for in Southeast Asia.

President Reagan has reaffirmed his commitment to obtain the fullest possible accounting for our missing Americans.

Secretary Weinberger has also said an accounting for our men is a matter of highest national priority.

Congress must also bring a proper sense of urgency to this issue.

Today we are considering under unanimous consent Senate Joint Resolution 171, the companion bill to Congressman GILMAN's House Joint Resolution 344 to declare July 20, 1984, National POW/MIA Recognition Day.

We must show the world we will not forget our servicemen.

We must affirm to the families of these men that we will not desert them.

As a nation, we cannot rest until each and every one of these men is accounted for and returned to the Nation for which they have made such great sacrifices.

I urge my colleagues to join me in sending this message across America, and across the world to Southeast Asia by unanimously passing Senate Joint Resolution 171 today.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 5, rule I, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on the motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

Such rollcall vote, if postponed, will be taken at the end of legislative business today.

TRUTH IN LENDING ACT AMENDMENTS

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 5026) to amend the Truth in Lending Act to impose a permanent ban on credit card surcharges, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 5026

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Federal Trade Commission and the Comptroller General jointly shall conduct a study to determine the various ways in which the cost of using credit cards can be borne directly by persons who use, or benefit from, credit cards.

(b) Not later than April 1, 1985, the Federal Trade Commission and the Comptroller General shall transmit a report to both Houses of the Congress containing—

(1) their findings and conclusions regarding the study conducted pursuant to subsection (a); and

(2) their recommendations for such legislative or administrative actions as are advisable.

SEC. 2. Section 3(c)(2) of Public Law 94-222 (15 U.S.C. 1666f note) is amended to read as follows:

"(2) The amendments made by paragraph (1) shall cease to be effective after May 31, 1985.".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) will be recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WYLIE) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO).

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am bringing H.R. 5026 before this body in the utmost spirit of compromise. The legislation provides for a 14-month extension of the ban on credit card surcharges. In simple language, that means that a business could not charge a consumer an extra fee solely because the consumer paid with a credit card.

On February 27, the surcharge ban expired. And despite several attempts to renew the ban on an unlimited basis, this House and the other body have been unable to agree on legislation.
